finds the essential parts of the plan temporarily set aside, leaving him powerless to act. The farmers proceed with their usual spring planting; and by the time the economic conference adjourns and the farm bill becomes operative, crops will have made considerable growth. Will the Secretary decide to pay the farmer for a portion of the unmatured crop and order it plowed under? Will it be necessary to postpone the administration of this great emergency program until next year? Perhaps the Secretary of Agriculture and the Secretary of State drew lots to determine whose plan should be tried first.

It may become necessary for the Secretary of State to conquer those charged with the administration of the Industrial Recovery Act, if it becomes a law this session; certainly its provisions for minimum wages, maximum hours, and controlled production cannot be applied if free trade is to flourish, unless the administration contemplates the substitution of European standard of living for that which to Americans are accustomed.

Bernard M. Baruch, recognized as an outstanding Democrat and confidant of the administration, in an address before the Brookings Institute, speaking of the domestic economic policy, said,

> This process is certain to raise American costs even further above world costs, and to require additional protection against importations. Coupled with the further effect of the farm bill to raise prices, all this struggle suggests inconsistency in domestic policy with any plan to lower tariffs in the World Economic Conference.

In spite of this, Congress is asked to grant the President authority to raise or lower the tariff as he sees fit, and in order that the conference may not be disturbed, Democratic leaders are prepared to force adjournment of Congress before June 12.

I believe the time has come for Congress to assume its constitutional rights. We Members of Congress are charged with the welfare of the country, and should stay on the job, prepared to safeguard the Nation in this time of emergency. It has been repeatedly stated by administration spokesmen that much of the emergency legislation so far enacted is experimental. Already the Democratic Members of this House have decided in caucus that the veterans' provisions of the Economy Act are being overdone in accordance with the President's regulations. Yet they are content to rely on the administration to correct these wrongs. If they are sincere in their protest, why do they not assert themselves by legislation?

Congress should not adjourn until the experimental stage has passed, until that time, the emergency will continue to exist.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, a Republican yields to a Democrat, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX] 4 minutes.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee, and my distinguished colleague from New York. I think there is one subject that the real progressive Democrats and Republicans can always agree upon, and that is the absolute necessity for farm relief of various sorts.

In my judgment there is not a piece of legislation passed by this Congress that will be of more lasting and permanent benefit to the farmers of this country than this bill that we are going to enact, for I am sure we will enact it.

In my State, Ohio, the vast majority of farmers, in their loans for seed and livestock and field operations when they borrow, have to pay 36 percent to the loan sharks.

The chairman of the committee, Mr. JONES, in his opening remarks stated the fact that evidence was before the committee to show that in many instances small farm loans were made at the rate of 30 to 40 percent.

In Ohio, when a farmer borrows $100 or $300, he pays 3 percent interest per month. He pays it once every month. He must pay $3 on a hundred-dollar loan every month, and they take a chattel mortgage on every bit of property he owns. They take a chattel mortgage on every bit of livestock on his place, and they will hold that mortgage and come back about every 90 days and take an inventory, and if he has any increase in the livestock, they demand an additional mortgage that will cover all the increase in the livestock.

In our State we feed a great many cattle. We feed quite a number of lambs and a great many hogs.

Now, the average farmer who is progressive and wants to fertilize and enrich his soil feeds more livestock than he can raise sufficient feed for. Consequently he must buy feed, and he goes to the money lender. Formerly banks would loan on 6 months for feed operations. Then they cut that down to 90 days, then to 60 days, and finally to 30 days; and now lending operations by local banks to the livestock feeder in Ohio is represented by that quantity known in algebra as "minus x", which means the tail end of nothing. [Laughter.]

I am not one of those to say he hopes this is only a temporary measure. I hope it may be made a permanent measure. The farmers in my State use a great deal of fertilizer, and when they buy that fertilizer they usually want some time upon it. Under this bill I am told that these small loans may be made for a period of 1 year, at not to exceed 6 percent interest, and at the expiration of that time, if additional time is needed, it may be renewed for 2 years or even extended for the third year. I think every Member here agrees on the absolute necessity of maintaining the real base. the real structure of this Nation, its agriculture.

Mention has been made here of the various legislative remedies that have been enacted for the benefit of agriculture during the past 4 years. In my humble judgment, practically all the measures passed by Congress during the past 4 years have been enacted with the thought uppermost that these measures were of real benefit to farmers. Unfortunately, in the past, Members of Congress have been misled or deceived by high administration officials or by so-called "farm leaders." These so-called "farm leaders" have not been confined to any one farm organization, but like a pestilence have been prevalent in many. Their business is to farm the farmers at high salaries for themselves. Back in 1925, 1926, and 1927, when the McNary-Haugen bill was debated on the floor of the House, not a single so-called "farm leader" in Ohio supported the bill. In fact, they opposed the bill, using the old bromidic hog wash that all the farmer needed was to let him alone and he would work out his own salvation.

Strange to relate, it was practically all these so-called "farm leaders" in Ohio who were out carrying the banner of Herbert Hoover in the 1928 campaign. Clever and selfish as usual, they had their ears to the ground and sensed that Hoover would be elected. They knew that the real farmers of the country would demand relief legislation. So they conceived and concocted the hybrid child of the industrialist—international bankers—farm-the-farmer crowd of relievers. Hence the Federal Farm Board, with Alexander Legge, king of the International Harvester Trust, was their own baby. Congress, even though it was a Republican Congress, should not be blamed for this abortive attempt to relieve the farmer. With Legge, the $100,000-a-year Harvester king at the head, little except what has actually occurred in the farm debacle could have been expected. In 1930, Alexander Legge in a letter to me, at a time when wheat was selling for 75 cents a bushel predicted that it would soon sell for 40 cents. His prediction proved to be right. It was all a scheme of the International Harvester Co. to bring down the price of wheat to 40 cents a bushel so that farmers would then trade their wheat for grain binders and other machinery at Legge's trade-in price of 70 cents a bushel. In view of this dastardly betrayal of the farmer for the benefit of the Harvester king and his associates, I now wish to defend all those Members of Congress, Democrats, Republicans, and Farmer-Laborites, alike, who voted for the bill authorizing the creation of the Hoover Federal Farm Board. These gentlemen were honest in purpose and sincere in their convictions.

This Seventy-third Congress has enacted, however, legislation that will prove to be a cure instead of a local anesthetic. Instead of giving the farmers sugar-coated pills to swallow, we are giving them a blood transfusion that will rebuild their shrunken frames to normal size. The general farm relief act, the Farm Mortgage Act of 1933, the abandonment of the gold standard are proving their effectiveness in advance of actual operation, proof of which is found in the recent rapid advances in the grain markets, in the cotton markets, in the livestock and provisions markets, to say nothing of sharp advance in securities and bonds, and the renewal of hope the country over.

Unfortunately one serious omission has been made. A legislative omission that is costing 3,000 farmers their homes and farms and their all, every time the sun rises and sets. The average money lender of today is a Shylock to the core. He not only demands, but receives his pound of flesh. If the shocking revelations of the business methods of Morgan & Co. giving to preferred lists of customers millions of dollars, by selling them stock at $20 a share when it was selling on the open market for $37.50 a share, is only a form of legalized bribery, yet this practice is no worse, no more to be condemned, no more damnable than the legal confiscation of 3,000 farms in this country every day by the money lenders.

On April 25 I introduced a bill in the House of Representatives to amend an act entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", approved July 1, 1898, and acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, approved March 3, 1933; to restore confidence and prevent revolution by farmers and home owners by providing for a suspension of real-estate foreclosures for a period of 1 year. This bill reduced to simple terms, and enacted into law, would cause a complete suspension of foreclosures for the period of 1 year. Its provisions are simple and are as follows:

SECTION 1. If on or within 6 months after the day this act takes effect any farmer is unable to pay, and is in default in the payment of, either principal or interest of any debt secured by a mortgage on his farm, or of taxes the nonpayment of which constitutes a default under such mortgage, such default shall constitute an act of bankruptcy and such farmer being therefore unable to pay his debts as they fall due shall be deemed insolvent and a bankrupt for the purposes of this title.

SEC. 2. No proceeding to foreclose or otherwise to enforce any claim against or out of the farm of such bankrupt and no sale on foreclosure, execution, or otherwise shall be instituted, further prosecuted, held, or effected on or within 6 months after the day this act takes effect except upon petition in bankruptcy duly filed in the court of the United States pursuant to the act of July 1, 1898, entitled "An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States", as heretofore amended.

SEC. 3. Upon proper petition under oath alleging the facts constituting bankruptcy as defined in section 1 hereof any court of the United States having jurisdiction shall, and any court of record of a State having appropriate equity jurisdiction may, forthwith by temporary order, and on due notice and hearing by further order, stay, or enjoin any proceeding or sale in violation of this title and may enter such other orders pursuant to law as may be appropriate and reasonably required in such cases in order that the relief provided for by this title may be made available and proceedings in bankruptcy thereby avoided.

In my judgment, every Member of this House, be he Democrat, Republican, or Farmer-Laborite, wants to stop this wanton foreclosure. The question in the past has been how can it be done legally? How to hurdle the barrier of constitutionality? I have answered that question. Archimedes, I believe, it was who exclaimed "Eureka" when he found that for which he had been searching for years—my exclamation now is "Eureka." I have found that which all the constitutional lawyers, all the judges, all the Governors of States, and even Members of Congress said cannot be found—an absolute and immediate suspension of foreclosures. In those never-to-be-forgotten days of easy money, swollen fortunes, and fat incomes for others, which ended abruptly on October 25, 1929, when $30,000,000,000 zoomed out of Wall Street, little heed was given to farmers' complaints. When we asserted that 40 percent of the Nation's purchasing power emanated from the soil, we were branded as chronic kickers, quacks, demagogues, and radicals.

And so conceited, self-satisfied, smug, and complacent did the Nation become that tariff walls were erected so high that the farmers' last hope, the foreign markets, were effectually closed. Then, when the banks and financial institutions closed, security values went down almost to the vanishing point, city real estate became a liability instead of an asset, and the farmers all bankrupted—the little farmer, the big farmer, the man with 40 acres of land, the owner of 5,000 acres, all frozen fast in the strangling clutches of the money lender; the whole Nation has undergone a rude, painful, and costly awakening. At last the Wall Street banker, the industrialist in his swivel chair, realizes that 50,000,000 people are directly dependent upon soil prosperity for their own welfare, and that the other 70,000,000 people automatically rise or fall with the purchasing or nonpurchasing power of the 50,000,000.

The depression which now engulfs us may be rightly termed "the logical sequence of an era of superselfishness, blind indifference, stupid meddling, and colossal blundering"—selfish because they first said there was nothing wrong with the farmer; blind because they then told him to work out his own salvation; blundering because each attempt at farm relief was abortive and costly to taxpayers. The Farm Board failed because the Government refused to restrict the predatory plundering of Chicago grain gamblers and racketeers, who sold the Farm Board short by margining wheat 10 cents a bushel and cotton $15 a bale.

Here it is, H.R. 5237. The enactment of this bill into law will immediately suspend all foreclosures and give the farmers and home owners a breathing spell, an opportunity to hold their homes and their farms until they, by rising commodity prices or by reemployment, can pay the delinquent taxes and interest that they owe. Will you enact it into law or will you permit this human suffering and misery that is breaking the purses and the hearts of 3,000 of our best citizens go on? The time to act is now—yesterday is gone, tomorrow never comes, but today is here.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. DIRKSEN].

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Chairman, I want to direct an inquiry to the chairman of the committee. On page 15 of the bill I notice that so far as the capital of the central banks is concerned, it shall be an unascertained amount, to be determined by the Governor, while on page 18, in section 7, the so-called "central bank" is authorized to issue debentures, the only limit of which is not to exceed five times the paid-in capital and surplus of the bank. If you have an unascertained capital for the bank, and it can issue debentures for five times the paid-in capital and surplus, it occurs to me that you are granting a tremendous amount of authority that would be easily subject to abuse and would probably precipitate the same difficulty that the so-called "joint-stock land banks" found themselves in with some of their stock selling as low as 16 or 17.

Mr. JONES. The Governor will determine the amount of the stock so that it will be fixed. Of course he has to use the funds available for both the central bank and the various regional cooperative banks and fix the amount in each case.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Precisely; but there is no limitation in the bill that I can see on the amount that he can issue.

Mr. JONES. He has to determine the credit needs and what capital is required to meet it. There is limitation on what is available for its use.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 minute more.

Mr. DIRKSEN. Just to carry on the discussion. I would say that you can build up a tremendous need in any particular locality and, with the Governor having practically arbitrary power to determine the amount of stock to be issued and likewise the amount of debentures, does not the chairman believe that some ascertained amount should be written into the bill?

Mr. JONES. The total amount that may be available for all these banks is simply the balance that may be left from the result of the Farm Board debacle. So there is in essence a physical limitation on those funds, and there will probably not be more than $140,000,000 or $150,000,000 in toto for all the cooperative banks and the central cooperative bank. If it is a sound credit, there is not any reason why there should not be security adequate for whatever the credit system will need.

Mr. DIRKSEN. The reaction will come back ultimately in the difficulty of putting these debentures on the market.

Mr. JONES. There is a 5-to-1 limit on debentures.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has again expired.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 1 minute to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BLANCHARD].

Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Chairman, I have asked this in order to make an inquiry about what new machinery is necessary in this set-up. Just what new machinery is being created?

Mr. JONES. There is no new machinery except the necessary regional and local banks and corporations for the purpose of carrying out the consolidation of lending agencies needed in making loans to agriculture, and those would simply be a regional production corporation and a regional cooperative bank in each Federal land-bank district, plus a central cooperative bank in Washington.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wisconsin has expired.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER].

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Chairman, some years ago the Intermediate Credits Act was passed for the purpose of extending loans to farmers. Under the Intermediate Credits Act farmers in various States and counties in the agricultural sections of the country set up production-credit associations. Most of those associations, as far as the South is concerned, failed, I believe, largely because of the type of men who organized the associations and because they were not properly supervised by the land-bank officials or the intermediate-credit bank officials. Later we commenced making what is known as seed loans. We all realized that these loans are unsound and very wasteful. Recently we established what is known as the Regional Agricultural Credit Corporation, which is making loans direct to farmers. For instance, one branch located at Raleigh, N.C., is making loans in several States, in a great many instances far removed from the actual farmer who is doing the borrowing. This method of financing farmers brings about quite a lot of expense, and it is very inconvenient and unsatisfactory to the farmer. This bill proposes to create or establish 12 production credit corporations that will eventually take over the Regional Agricultural Credit Corporations and seed-loan agencies now functioning in the United States.

This bill also establishes 12 cooperative banks. Neither the corporations nor banks will loan direct to farmers but will furnish the capital to cooperatives and to production credit associations for the purpose of loaning money direct to farmers through these associations. The farmers' paper given to these associations will be discounted at the intermediate-credit banks.

My friends, I believe that this bill will establish the necessary machinery to give to farmers production credit, one of the things which the farmers very much need and at a reasonable rate of interest. During this session of Congress we have passed a great many helpful pieces of legislation, especially for farmers. The success of these bills will depend largely on how they are administered. What we actually need now to complete the picture for farmers in the way of legislation, to be helpful to agriculture, is what the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JOHNSON] referred to awhile ago, and that is a real marketing system, fair distribution, when and where needed, and at a fair price to the man who produces farm products in this country.

My friends, today the consuming public needs every pound and every bushel of farm products that we have on hand, and the consuming public could use them at a fair price to the actual producer. Farmers cannot organize, properly grade, and market their products. They are at the mercy of middlemen and a cutthroat marketing system. "Oh!" they say, "let us leave it to the cooperatives." As far as the South is concerned, they never have been able to organize and never will. There should be some machinery created on the part of this Government whereby central marketing facilities can be set up, so that the farmer will be able to market his product at a fair price. In the meantime it would mean as much to the consumer as it would to the farmer. I agree with the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. JOHNSON], and I have made this statement all along, that until something is done to bring about a fair price for that which the farmers produce, in line with the price they pay for that which they buy, normal prosperity will be long drawn out.

My friends, this is a good bill, and I am glad to support it. I believe this will bring about the proper financing of farm production and marketing, and I am hoping that a real marketing bill, a fair price fixing bill, so to speak, will eventually be passed by this Congress.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER] has expired.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Will the gentleman yield? I want to ask the gentleman one question.

Mr. FULMER. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. I know we have great cooperative organizations. There is the grading and standardizing of the products, but when it comes to selling, what power have we got then? A certain chain store that I know of sold butterfat in its stores for less than they paid the cooperative organizations for it.

Mr. FULMER. May I say to the gentleman that the farmers in South Carolina have sweetpotatoes cured and stored away, and various other farm products and vegetables, but they are unable to sell them at a fair price? When they deliver them in the city of Washington and other places by truck, express, or by freight, the price is fixed at a ridiculously low figure, largely because we have not a real marketing system whereby farmers have any bargaining power.

Mr. JOHNSON of Minnesota. Would it not be better to see that we put the farmer in a condition where he can bargain, and not allow the long end to be in the hands of those who have got the money to pay for it, who beat down the price on our side?

Mr. FULMER. I agree with the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. FULMER] has again expired.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TURPIN] 3 minutes. He has a letter from an overseas World War veteran who has paid for his farm and he cannot borrow a cent through the land bank of his district, because he cannot show any crop report for the last year.

Mr. McFARLANE. Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McFARLANE. Has not all time for general debate expired?

The CHAIRMAN. There are 3 minutes remaining.

Mr. TURPIN. The letter from my constituent, an overseas veteran, reads as follows:

HONORABLE SIR: Permit me a few moments of your time, as I feel that I have a just complaint.

I own and live on a farm of 42 acres in Fairmount Township. It is free of debt but unstocked, and with very little tools. I managed to pay for the place when times was better by working at my trade, which is carpentry, with the goal in mind that I could eventually be able to quit the carpenter business and farm it. This depression, of course, of the past 4 years has set me back, and I find myself with no work and no way of working my farm. The banks won't loan any money, and my only hope was this new farm-relief bill. From the secretary of the farm-loan bank in this district I find out that I can't obtain a loan because I can't show any crop report for last year. Now, Mr. TURPIN, where I feel that I have a just complaint is that I know of people who have been granted loans and who also have made very little effort to keep out of debt. I, who have managed to pay my obligations, born in this country, served overseas in the World War, can't get a loan. Now, Mr. TURPIN, as one ex-service man to another, I ask, does that seem fair and right? The loan I would like to get would be for $1,000. With that amount I could stock the farm and fix up my buildings, that sadly need it.

My purpose of writing to you was the hope that perhaps there will be some measure enacted that would help me and that you, sir, would be kind enough to inform me.

Thanking you, sir, and hoping, I am truly yours,

JOHN J. MEYERS.

I want to bring to the attention of the Committee that this overseas veteran, who has worked at the carpentry trade and who has paid every dollar that he owes on his farm but has not actually farmed it because working as a carpenter, now wants to move onto the farm, get implements, and fix up the buildings; and while others who cannot pay their mortgages can make a loan, this man, who has paid for his farm, is unable to get a loan simply because he cannot show a return on crop production for the last year, which, of course, was not harvested.

I hope the Congress will so word the Farm Credit Act now under discussion that our thrifty folks back home may benefit by the same privileges that our less fortunate or less ambitious people now enjoy.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. TURPIN] has expired.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I want to ask the Chairman of the Committee on Agriculture this question: It is my understanding that anybody who is in a situation like this overseas veteran will have made available by this bill an opportunity to get money. Is that right?

Mr. JONES. This bill will enable the farm-credit administration to function completely. I think his opportunity to secure funds would be under the farm mortgage bill which was included as a part——

Mr. CLARKE of New York. It is only to borrow money for crop production. His farm is paid for.

Mr. JONES. I misunderstood the gentleman. This bill furnishes the type of credit to cover situations of that sort.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc.,

TITLE I

SECTION 1. This act shall be known as the "Farm Credit Act of 1933."

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, it has been said frequently that when one lie is told it usually takes a dozen more to patch it up. That can about be said in connection with legislation. When one bad piece of unsound legislation is enacted, it usually takes a dozen more unsound pieces of legislation to patch it up.

I do not know how far we are drifting, but this much is certain: We are headed as directly as we can be to that day when Government handles all banking in this country. We find the Government, through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, furnishing credit for railroads, banks, insurance companies, and whatnot.

We find various forms of credit relief being given by this Congress and by previous Congresses. We have the Government engaged in all ends of the banking business. Through the Postal Savings deposits it is accepting deposits. It is in the business of lending money and it is likewise engaged in the business of borrowing money at the rate of billions of dollars per year.

The proper institution to take care of farm loans is the local bank, but the trouble is that about 10 years ago the Government, through the national-banking department, made rules and regulations pertaining to bank examinations that destroyed agricultural credit, laying down the rule that agricultural credit should be liquidated every 60 or 90 days or 6 months. That destroyed local credit for agriculture, and it has gone on until credit has been denied to agriculture. In desperation agriculture has been forced to turn to the Government for all these socialistic forms of credit, very unsatisfactory, not even a good substitute for that which was wrongfully taken away from agriculture.

Then, to top it off, last week this House of Representatives, by an overwhelming vote passed a piece of legislation which makes banking in country communities impossible. The House passed a bill by which no bank can long be safe and secure which does not get into the Federal Reserve. In the same bill it is provided that no bank many enter the Federal Reserve without a minimum capitalization of $50,000. A bank in a country town of 100 people would have to have a capitalization of $50,000 in order to enter the Federal Reserve. There, through legislation, country banking was destroyed.

So Congress last week put on the cap piece of destruction of local banking for agriculture and the result is that this bill is absolutely necessary for agricultural credit. This bill would not be necessary except for the asininity of the Government itself through the rules of the national banking department, the operation of the Federal Reserve, and unwise legislation. In the end, Government has done much to destroy the local country banks, and now we find in an effort to make amends for those mistakes the Government is obliged to take $40,000,000 out of a depleted Treasury and advance it to this institution, take $80,000,000 more that has heretofore been appropriated for farm credit and place it into this fund. So we have taken $120,000,000 of money out of the Treasury of the United States to set up a Socialistic banking system to replace the sound banking system we once had in this country and that so well served the interests of agriculture. This can never be a substitute for that which the Government has destroyed, but it is better than leaving agriculture with no credit. Upon this theory I am going to support this bill, but he who does not like this bill should remember that when he sat here last week and voted for a banking bill which required a capitalization of $50,000 minimum for a bank to get into the Federal Reserve he created the situation which made this bill absolutely necessary. He who voted for that bill voted to set up conditions which destroy the State banking system. It has been the State banking system which furnished most of our agricultural credit. Now the Public Treasury must do that which was once done so well by local country State banks.

The Clerk read as follows:

REVOLVING FUND AND APPROPRIATION

SEC. 5. (a) There is hereby created a revolving fund of not to exceed $120,000,000, which shall be made up as follows:

(1) The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and directed to make available to the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration all unobligated balances of the following funds and all sums heretofore returned or released to the Corporation from such funds:

(3) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $40,000,000 out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

(b) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated the sum of $2,000,000, which shall remain available until expended, for all necessary administrative expenses in connection with the establishment and supervision of the Production Credit Corporations and the Production Credit Associations.

(c) The authority of the Governor of the Farm Credit Administration to allocate and expend out of the funds covered by subsection (a) of this section such amounts as he shall deem necessary for salaries, expenses, and all other administrative expenditures during the fiscal year 1934 in the execution of the functions for which such funds have hitherto been available shall not be deemed to be restricted by this section.

(d) The authority to make loans during the calendar year 1933 pursuant to the act of February 4, 1933 (Public, No. 827, 72d Cong.), out of funds made available by that act shall not be deemed to be restricted by this section.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. HOPE: On page 6, in line 3, after the comma following the parenthesis, insert "as amended."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I think this amendment should be adopted. I have no objection to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE II—PRODUCTION CREDIT ASSOCIATIONS

ESTABLISHMENT OF PRODUCTION CREDIT ASSOCIATIONS

SEC. 20. The governor is authorized and directed to provide for the establishment of corporations to be known as "Production Credit Associations." Such associations may be organized by 10 or more farmers desiring to borrow money under the provisions of this title. Such individuals shall enter into articles of incorporation which shall specify in general terms the objects for which the association is formed and the powers to be exercised by it in carrying out the functions conferred upon it by this act. Such articles shall be signed by the individuals uniting to form the association and a copy thereof shall be forwarded to the Production Credit Corporation of the district, and such copy shall be filed and preserved in its office. The governor may, for good cause shown, deny a charter to such individuals. Upon the approval of such articles by the governor, the association shall become as of the date of such approval a body corporate. The governor shall have power, under rules and regulations prescribed by him, or by prescribing the terms of the charter of the association, or both, to provide for the organization, management, and conduct of the business of the association; and the power of the governor shall extend to prescribing the amount of the stock of such association; fixing the territory within which its operations may be carried on; fixing the method of election and appointment of, and the amount and payment of the compensation of, directors, officers, and employees; fixing the maximum amount of individual loans which may be made; prescribing the conditions under which the stock may be retired; and providing for the consolidation of two or more such associations. The governor may, at any time, direct such changes in the charter of any such association as he finds necessary in accomplishing the purposes of this title. Bylaws of any such association may be adopted by the directors but shall not be valid unless approved by the governor.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. Title II, section 20, deals with production-credit associations. Perhaps I should wait until title II has been read throughout, but ever since I have been in Congress I have never seen the necessity of creating all these little local associations, and I just want to interrogate, in a good-humored way, our distinguished chairman with reference to the necessity of organizing the production-credit associations.

Why is it that in making loans to farmers we make him go through so many different associations as to bewilder him in a way to make it difficult for him to get the money? That is the truth of it.

Mr. JONES. If the gentleman will——

Mr. HASTINGS. Just a minute; I merely want to have a good-natured colloquy with the gentleman from Texas.

In the rural credit bill of 1916 we provided for farm-land banks. This bill is similar. Then we provided for local loan associations, and when they were organized nobody could get any money unless he joined one of these local loan associations. When the members of the local loan associations have secured the loans for which they made application they take no more interest in the associations.

Now, why is it necessary to organize these production-credit associations, and why is it necessary to have section 20 and the following sections of title II with reference to associations, and why is it that farmers have to take stock in the production-credit association, and why is it that it could not be arranged for loans to be made to the individual farmer-borrower direct?

Mr. JONES. The gentleman has embodied several questions in one, but if the gentleman will permit, the system he suggests would require the Government to furnish all the money. This is a rediscount system which enables them to secure the funds through the intermediate credit bank.

Mr. HASTINGS. Why could not the loan be made direct to the individual farmer without his having to go through the local association?

Mr. JONES. Under the Federal land-bank system the administrative cost, annually, is $950,000, of which about $350,000 is repaid. The direct-loan system of the crop-production loans and the regional Agricultural Credit Corporation has an administrative cost annually of $9,000,000.

If you were going to try to lend direct on these notes you would have to send men out to examine the security behind $25, $50, and $75 notes. Nobody is interested, yet someone must make the examination, and the cost would be prohibitive unless the Government is going to pay the cost.

Mr. HASTINGS. Who pays the cost under this bill?

Mr. JONES. I may state to the gentleman that I do not like the association method any better than he does, and if he can find some method that will carry its own cost that is better than this and not cost the farmer 30 or 40 percent, I should like for him to suggest it.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the gentleman will permit me a moment of my own time, let me say to him that if costs have to be incurred, of course, they have to be paid. The organization of production associations will not reduce the cost.

[Here the gavel fell].

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HASTINGS. If these costs are necessary and have to be paid, they have to be borne by somebody, either by the members of the local production credit association or by the Corporation. In the end the individual borrower must pay them. I do not see how you are going to avoid the costs, and I do not think the gentleman's explanation——

Mr. JONES. The gentleman has studied this question too much to make that statement. The gentleman understands that the hope is that local people being interested, even in a small degree, they may help in the supervision and in furnishing the information with respect to loans.

Mr. HASTINGS. But our experience with the Federal farm-land banks—and I speak out of a depth of experience—has been different, and I may say to the gentleman that I do not believe he will find that many of these local loan associations meets on an average of once in 10 years. They do not in my district. They never meet.

Mr. JONES. That depends on the locality. In some places they meet and they have been very successful whereas in other instances they have been unsuccessful. It depends very largely on the locality.

Mr. HASTINGS. As the gentleman knows, I have urged a direct loan provision, and there is a provision in the bill which recently passed providing for the making of direct loans without having to go through any local association. The farmer will understand that.

Mr. JONES. Let them try this and see if they can make it work. Under the Federal land bank system where a man has a 30- or 40-year loan, it is quite different. They have a system similar to the one in the bill in Arkansas and have three of these associations in my section of the State, and they are working very well. A man may want a temporary loan for just a short time, and if you have to go out every time one of these applications for a temporary loan is made, you make the cost prohibitive.

Mr. HASTINGS. I have a farmer in my district who has written to me asking how he is to make application for a loan. Will the gentleman from Texas in my time give me the form of letter that I should write him in order to give him this information?

Mr. JONES. I will say to the gentleman that they will have a production credit corporation at Wichita, Kans. They will have the forms and the instructions as to how he should proceed. If there is an association in his locality he can go immediately to the secretary of that association and get the information.

Mr. HASTINGS. Suppose there is no association in his locality?

Mr. JONES. Then it will be necessary for at least 10 of them who want to make such loans, to get together and form an association.

Mr. HASTINGS. Suppose he cannot get 10 farmers who want to make such applications for loans to join in forming an association?

Mr. JONES. He still has all the sources of credit which he has today in the commercial-credit system of the country.

Mr. HASTINGS. Can he apply direct?

Mr. JONES. The gentleman does not think that the United States Government, as a government, should furnish all the credit to every citizen in America?

Mr. HASTINGS. No; but the credit that it does furnish, I want it to furnish direct, so that the individuals may know how to make application for it.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman cannot get into an argument with me about this, because I have raised the question and I have always been met face to face with the cost proposition in making such loans. With respect to a long-time loan I agree with the gentleman and we did away with the necessity of this where a man gets his loan for a long period of time and then is through; but we hope to have local associations which will continue and furnish continuing sources of short-time credit.

Mr. HASTINGS. Can this farmer in my district make an application for this loan in any other way than through the production credit association, must he become a member of it under this bill?

Mr. JONES. He must become a member of it under this bill; yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. And he cannot make an application direct.

Mr. JONES. He cannot make an application direct.

Mr. HASTINGS. That answers my inquiry. I now yield to my good friend from New York.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I think the gentleman is conducting a filibuster here against farm legislation with a double-header ball game in progress.

Mr. HASTINGS. There is nobody more deeply interested in farm legislation than I am, and I want to be able to instruct my farmer constituents how they may be able to make applications for these production loans.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield to the gentleman from Colorado.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I want to ask the gentleman what type of corporation is this production-credit association. Is this a regular corporation organized under the laws of the State?

Mr. HASTINGS. The Government organizes it, as I understand it, but I yield to the chairman of the committee for the details.

Mr. JONES. It is organized under this act and is a corporation chartered by the Federal Government.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I agree with the gentleman from Texas that the cost of administration of the seed and the crop production loans is excessive. I have repeatedly stated on this floor the situation that existed in the St. Louis office. At one time we had 455 employees in that office.

Senator MCKELLAR told me at one period they had 750 employees in the Memphis office. It was clearly a political set-up, engineered by the former Secretary of Agriculture. The record shows that practically the same people who were in control prior to March 4, are in control today in the regional offices, although there is an exception in my city, St. Louis, as to the head of the office.

I do not agree that it is wise to entirely eliminate business directly with the individual. What I wanted to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma was, and I wish the gentleman would answer in my time, what does it cost the farmer belonging to one of these associations which enables him to make a loan? Does he have to pay any dues?

Mr. HASTINGS. Only in connection with the amount he borrows. The farmer has to subscribe to a certain amount of stock.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. It is not going to be like it is now. Now, if you borrow $150 to buy seed to plant your crop you do not have to pay any dues or buy any stock.

Mr. HASTINGS. You do not have to pay any dues here.

Mr. DOXEY. All the farmer has to do to get his loan is to subscribe an amount of stock equal to 5 percent of the loan. Class B stock is an advantage to him in owning, because when he once gets that stock he can come back for a second loan, and he does not have to subscribe for any more stock. And that stock can be under certain circumstances transferred for class A stock.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman from Mississippi tell me where the farmer who wants to get a loan to plant seed and who has no money, where is he going to get it to pay for the stock he subscribes for?

Mr. DOXEY. Out of his loan.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Part of the money he gets from the Government purchases stock?

Mr. DOXEY. Absolutely.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I want to ask the gentleman if under the bill when a man pays $5 for class B stock, does the bill provide that he can get the money back when he pays the full amount of the loan within 2 years, and does he have to buy class A stock whether he wants it or not?

Mr. DOXEY. No. Class A stock is worth something.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. He is forced to buy the stock——

Mr. JONES. Oh, no; he does not have to buy stock.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Well, then he does not get the loan. Under the farm mortgage bill, when they paid the loan they got credit for the amount of stock.

Mr. JONES. The gentleman is talking about the land-bank feature.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. It provided that when they came in and paid the loan they got credit for the amount of stock they owned.

Mr. JONES. The Government has to put up some money. It is hoped that this will furnish a source of legal credit.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has expired.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute more. My time has been used by others.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I simply want to say that I hope the Committee on Agriculture and the Secretary of Agriculture will finally determine what should be done to help the farmer. We pass an agricultural appropriation bill carrying $60,000,000 for the purpose of showing the farmer how to raise more crops. Then we passed a farm bill which in its effect was to get the farmer to reduce his acreage. Now we come along with a third set-up, which is to continue loans to the farmers and so he can get deeper into debt. I think it is about time that you come to some conclusion as to what really ought to be done for the farmer and pass one bill and not half a dozen bills. Do not do one thing today and another tomorrow. If this bill will save the Government money in administration of the various laws now in force, I am for it.

Mr. JONES. I think we are entitled to pass as many bills for the farmer as we pass for the banker.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I think it is about an even break now.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Missouri has again expired.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 23. Each Production Credit Association shall, under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Production Credit Corporation of the district with the approval of the governor, invest its funds and make loans to farmers for general agricultural purposes, but such part of its funds as is represented by the guaranty fund provided for in section 22 shall not be devoted to making loans to farmers. Such loans shall be made on such terms and conditions, at such rates of interest, and with such security as may be prescribed by the Production Credit Corporation. No loan shall be made for a less amount than $50, nor shall any one borrower be indebted to the association at any one time in an amount in excess of 20 percent of the capital and guaranty fund of the association or, if the loan is secured by collateral approved by the Corporation, in an amount in excess of 50 percent of the capital and guaranty fund, but loans may be made to any borrower in an amount in excess of 50 percent of the capital and guaranty fund if the loan is approved by the Production Credit Commissioner of the Farm Credit Administration. Borrowers shall be required to own, at the time the loan is made, class B stock in an amount equal in fair book value (not to exceed par), as determined by the association, to $5 per $100 or fraction thereof of the amount of the loan. Such stock shall not be canceled or retired upon payment of the loan, but may be transferred or exchanged as provided in section 21.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BROWN of Kentucky: Page 12, line 21, strike out the word "not", and in line 22, of the same page, after the word "loan", strike out the remainder of the section and insert in lieu thereof: "and credit for par value allowed on loans."

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I wish Members would turn to page 12. It will be seen that the stock which the farmers are required to buy is not canceled when they pay their loan off or retire it, but it can be transferred or exchanged, as provided in section 21, and section 21 provides that they can exchange it for the original stock of this corporation. You are going to have a stock-brokerage racket going on, because the farmer will come in and pay off a hundred-dollar loan and he has a $5 share of stock he cannot get credit for, and the fellows who organize this corporation are the only market there would be for that; and unless the farmer could find somebody else who wanted to borrow some money these people can go out on the market and buy this $5 share of stock for $1 or whatever they offer. When the home loan bill and the farm loan bill were passed we provided that when the farmer or the home owner paid off the loan he got credit in that loan for the amount of stock he bought. There is no reason on earth why you should put this farmer under the obligation to buy $5 worth of stock that he cannot get credit for when he pays off his loan. If something is not done to relieve that situation, you are making him pay a $5 brokerage fee to get that loan, and then you charge him 6 percent on top of it, which makes in all 11 percent. If that is farm relief, I want to know what farmer is going to get relief under it. There are not over 25 or 30 of us here discussing this $120,000,000 proposition this afternoon, but I should like 12 or 15 of us to give them a right when they walk in and pay every dollar they borrowed, plus 6-percent interest, to have credit for the $5 worth of stock which we make them take when we loan the money.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I wish it were possible to have the matter handled in that way. We raised that question in committee and had a discussion of it, but here is the difficulty in connection with the proposal of the gentleman from Kentucky. Some of these loans will be 90-day loans, and some of them 6 months. If a man is going to get his stock back immediately upon the payment of these short-term loans, there is no particular reason for requiring him to take it in the first place. It is expensive to make these short-term loans. It is hoped by having this small stock interest, even though it is small, that people in their local community will be able to supervise their loans and get credit on a little better basis at the place at which they rediscount and they can thus get the additional credit that will take care of the needs of the community. If he is to get his money back in each instance, then there is no provision at all for losses. There will be absolutely no way to take care of the losses, and ultimately each farm loan association must fail, and he predicts and foredooms every single association to failure. If you are going to have this system at all, let us have it as it is. If you are going to have a direct system, have it that way. If the directors of an association want to, they may permit the farmer to sell his stock, or they may take it over for its par value, or they may let him give it to somebody else who wants to obtain a loan. There will be no trouble about that, but you do not want to provide a loophole that will absolutely destroy any hope of success of the system.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. If this man walks in on a 90-day loan and pays back every dollar that he borrowed, has that association lost anything when it collects 6-percent interest on his loan; and if they require him to keep the $5 worth of stock, have they not charged him a brokerage fee of $5 for a loan of 90 days?

Mr. JONES. No; we have not, because he still has the value of that stock.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. If it has any value.

Mr. JONES. It will probably have a value. If this works out, it will; if it does not, we will have to change the system or do away with it entirely. It is not the business of the National Government to furnish all the money and all the credit to every individual in America.

We are trying to establish a sound system that will make credit available. It would not destroy a single chance that any individual farmer has to get credit as it is today. If you are going to make a success of the local corporations which must make a great many individual small loans, you must have some provision for building up the resources. If they are built up, if these individuals try to make it a success, they will get dividends on the stock. They will get their money back. I am sure that on the small loans, such as the illustration given by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN], the directors of the local association would say, "We will let the gentleman have his $5 back." But there must be provision to do whatever is necessary to carry it on.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Is it not absolutely impossible under this bill for that local association to do the very thing the gentleman says they may do?

Mr. JONES. No; it is not. If the gentleman will turn to page 10, line 3, he will find this provision:

No class B stock or any interest therein or right to receive dividends thereon, shall be transferred by act of parties or operation of law except to another farmer borrower or any individual eligible to become a borrower, and then only with the approval of the directors of the association.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Then what the gentleman says is impossible. The association cannot say "We will give you credit for $5 on this loan."

Mr. JONES. They can say "We will just transfer it."

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. If they have a borrower who is willing to accept it. If not, he loses his $5.

Mr. JONES. If they do not have in the locality some borrowers it will be a strange situation, judging by experience of the past.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Then it will be costing him a $5 brokerage fee.

Mr. JONES. Not necessarily. He will still have his stock.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] has expired.

The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BROWN].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BROWN of Kentucky) there were, ayes 13 and noes 32.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I have not been able to learn very much about this bill, but I hope it will do much good. However, I do know that if you are going to grant these extensions to farmers under the Federal farm-land banks, you will have to change the personnel of the officers of those banks or you are not going to get any relief along the line which the President of the United States is undertaking to give the farmers.

You have a set-up in those banks now where they have been antagonistic to the farmers of this country. They have been antagonistic to the policies of Congress, and they have sought in every way to avoid carrying out the intent of Congress in the matter of extension of credit under the $125,000,000 that we provided for them. They did not undertake to grant extensions to the farmers, but they undertook to drive them further and further, and since you passed the act to provide credit for the farmers to extend their loans, what do we find? You find emanating from some of these banks the most cold-blooded information that a man ever read. It will make a borrower shiver in his shoes and wonder if we are not going to wipe him off the face of the earth. Now they say, "We are going to use the personnel of the various Departments." Was the personnel under the Federal Farm Act friendly to the farmers? They did everything they could to play to the other crowd, and they have not changed their viewpoint overnight. If you think those fellows are going to aid the farmers in getting this money that you have turned over to them, the farmers will find they are a hard set to deal with.

My friends, I know that Congress has appropriated money time after time, and Congressmen have gone home to their districts and said to their farmers, "We have made provision for you." The farmers have answered, "We never heard about it." We have said, "We made extension provisions. You can get your loan extended." They said, "Why, I have been there trying to get mine extended for months, and the bank says I have got to pay this loan or they are going to foreclose."

I will tell you what some of this outfit you propose to make these loans have done in the past. They have taken a mortgage and sold it to some man in the town who had money for half the value of the mortgage, and they would not let the farmer who lived on the place buy it at any price. They would not give him any extension. Is that the same crowd you are going to have to carry out the will and wish of Congress? If so, they will have to change their line of thought overnight. We say, "Appraised property of the normal value." What do we mean by that? We mean the normal value under normal conditions at normal times. But how will they appraise it? You find them going out and appraising the land at the present low, depressed prices, and the farmers will not get any relief. You can keep them in there if you want to, but if you do not change this system, you will be back here next January hollering your heads off to do something for the farmers. That is all I have to say about it. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 24. Production credit associations doing business under this act are authorized to borrow from, and rediscount paper with, Federal intermediate credit banks subject to the restrictions, limitations, and conditions applicable under title II of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended (U.S.C., title 12, ch. 8). Except with the approval of the governor, production credit associations shall not have the power to borrow from or rediscount paper with any other bank or agency.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I shall not detain the committee any further. I have already detained you a few minutes ago on the same subject.

Mr. Chairman, it is my well-considered judgment that if I were writing this bill, I would strike out the whole of title II. I would not provide for production credit associations. I would have those applying for loans make direct application to the corporation. I would have them take stock, just as is provided they shall take stock through the production credit associations. With that I have no quarrel.

Out of deference to members of the committee and especially to our splendid, genial chairman I am not going to move to strike out title II, but I want to put myself on record as being opposed to this method of making loans to farmers. I am opposed to title II. If these loans ought to be made, they should not be made in such a circuitous way that it is an interminable process to get the loan through and get the money. There ought to be a more direct way of making application for these loans. These borrowers, perhaps, should be required to subscribe to stock. I am not asking any modification of this feature, but instead of going through associations they ought to be permitted to make application direct to the corporation and then comply with practically all the other provisions of this bill.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. HOEPPEL. The gentleman would have the Government itself make direct loans to the farmers.

Mr. HASTINGS. Well, there has got to be some kind of a set-up, some kind of an organization, to make an examination before these loans are made, and I am not criticizing that feature. The Government must be protected; I have no objection to that.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Answering the gentleman from Texas, I would rather give the farmers a checking account against the Government than to give it to the banks, especially to Mr. Dawes.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. HOPE. The gentleman said he would provide a method by which the farmers would get direct loans. As a matter of fact we have that set-up now in our regional agricultural credit corporations, yet I am sure the gentleman has had complaints concerning the methods of those corporations just as I have, and I am sure he does not think they have been entirely satisfactory in their operation.

Mr. HASTINGS. I want to say, not exactly in reply to the gentleman from Kansas, but in reply to an argument made a few minutes ago, that this method of making loans takes some cost off the Government by having these local associations formed; but let me say that every penny of this cost has got to be borne, and it must be borne by the individuals either direct or through local production-credit associations. The cost has got to be borne somewhere along the line. The cost is not lessened by having applications for loans made through associations.

Now, the gentleman from Kansas represents a great agricultural State. Does not the gentleman believe that if production-credit associations were left out and these borrowers could make application direct for these production loans to the corporation, complying with all the other regulations stipulated in this bill, that it would be more satisfactory, that loans would be expedited and that the farmer borrowers would be better satisfied?

Mr. HOPE. I may say in reply to the gentleman's question that the farmers can do that very thing now and have been able to ever since the regional agricultural-credit corporations were organized last year, yet the farmers have not found it entirely satisfactory. They say it takes too long to get an application considered, that it takes too long for an inspector to come several hundred miles in some cases and inspect the collateral. I am sure that there could not be any more delay or any more difficulty about making loans as provided for in this bill than there has been in the case of the regional agricultural-credit corporations where direct loans have been made.

Mr. HASTINGS. In reply to the gentleman from Kansas, I cannot see any possible good to come to the farmer through organizing production-credit associations. The farmer wants to get a loan. He has to make application for it. Why can he not make application direct to the corporation instead of going through a production-credit association?

Mr. HOPE. As I have said, we already have placed in effect such a system, but the farmers say that it is not entirely satisfactory.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 additional minute.

Mr. HILL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended 3 additional minutes, as I wish to ask him a question.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. HASTINGS. I wish the gentleman from Kansas would point out to the committee what special benefit comes to the borrower by the organization of these production-credit associations. Wherein is the cost lessened?

Mr. HOPE. Of course, there is this benefit: If we want to get the Government out of the business of loaning money, we have an opportunity to do it here because we are setting up these production-credit corporations, and if they are successful, eventually they will be owned not by the Government but by the farmers themselves. Now, I consider this some advantage unless we want the Government to continue in the business of loaning money. The gentleman may not agree with me in this, but I think this is one advantage.

Now, in the second place, so far as the Federal land-bank system is concerned, these local associations have proven successful. Each farmer deals with his neighbors and friends. They know conditions in their own community. The expense of administration and inspection is cut down very materially because you have local men in charge of making these loans who know something about the local situation. If you do not have that, then you must have someone go out from the regional bank 300 or 400 miles away, someone who does not know anything about the territory or the people in it, and who has no information as to the farmer's credit standing except what he may acquire by spending a few hours in that section. It seems to me that it is preferable to have a local set-up there with someone in charge who is familiar with local conditions. Does not the gentleman agree with me?

Mr. HASTINGS. I shall not take up any more time, but I may say that in my State they are inactive. They never meet.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Oklahoma may have 1 more minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. I think the gentleman has the same feeling about these agricultural-credit corporations as I have, and I may say that the corporation in my State of Alabama has rendered excellent service to the farmers there and have made better collections than have been made by the average commercial bank in that section.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is where loans are made direct.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then the gentleman is in sympathy with the suggestion I make.

Mr. HILL of Alabama. Exactly.

Mr. HASTINGS. And the gentleman believes that these intermediate or local associations should be abolished and the loans made to the individual farmers?

Mr. HILL of Alabama. As is now being done by the Agricultural Credit Corporations?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

[Here the gavel fell.]

The Clerk read as follows:

LENDING POWER OF BANKS FOR COOPERATIVES

SEC. 41. The Banks for Cooperatives are authorized to make loans to cooperative associations for any of the purposes and subject to the conditions and limitations set forth in the Agricultural Marketing Act, as amended, including amendments made by title V of this act, and subject to such terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the board of the bank with the approval of the governor.

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I rise only for the purpose of requesting the distinguished chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES], to explain lines 9, 10, and 11, on page 20—

To make loans to cooperative associations for any of the purposes and subject to the conditions and limitations set forth in the Agricultural Marketing Act as amended.

Mr. JONES. "Including amendments made by title V of this act", the gentleman will notice. This permits loans to be made to cooperatives, properly secured, and it makes the further provision that they must not only comply with the terms set out as to their loans heretofore made, but they must pay rates of interest of not less than 3 percent or more than 6 percent. Under the old act they were forced to make loans at the lowest rate that the Government paid at the last issue of Government obligations and they had to make some loans at one eighth of 1 percent, in certain instances, which was unfair as compared with rates to others.

Mr. TRUAX. Is it not true that that money was reloaned at very much greater rates of interest?

Mr. JONES. I understand, in some instances, it was. I would not want to cite specific instances, but I understand there were some abuses and it is hoped that this may be avoided under the limitations of this act.

Mr. TRUAX. Are there provisions in this act to avoid a recurrence of such procedure in the future?

Mr. JONES. At least any such procedure as that would be very much more difficult, because they are compelled to furnish adequate security, which would be of such a nature that they probably could not get some of the types of loans that have heretofore been had. Then we provide for loans to local cooperatives through these regional banks. It is the purpose to decentralize and to have types of credit available to local organizations such as local creameries, and it emphasizes this rather than the larger purpose, though provision is made for both kinds.

Mr. TRUAX. Then the gentleman can assure the Committee that no repetition of the abuses under the old act will occur under the new act, in his judgment?

Mr. JONES. At least, we hope they will not, and I do not believe anything like the abuses that have heretofore prevailed will occur. I could not assure the gentleman there would not be any abuses, but I do not think anything like the abuses that apparently crept into the other act will be manifest under this new provision.

Mr. TRUAX. And under this act they will be required to pay from 3 to 6 percent instead of one eighth of 1 percent, in some instances, under the old act.

Mr. JONES. Both in the new loans and the refinancing; yes.

Mr. TRUAX. I thank the gentleman.

The Clerk read as follows:

SECTION 50. (a) The following provisions of the Agricultural Marketing Act, as amended, are hereby repealed:

(1) Section 3 (relating to advisory commodity committees);

(2) Paragraph (4) of section 5 (relating to powers of the Farm Board to investigate overproduction);

(3) Paragraph (5) of section 5 (relating to miscellaneous investigations by the Farm Board);

(4) Paragraph (3) of subsection (a) of section 7 (relating to loans to assist in forming clearing-house associations);

(5) Paragraph (4) of subsection (a) of section 7 (relating to education in the advantages of cooperative marketing);

(6) Paragraph (5) of subsection (a) of section 7 (relating to loans to enable cooperatives to advance a greater share of the market price of commodities than is practicable under other credit facilities;

(7) Section 10 (authorizing the Farm Board to assist in forming clearing-house associations); and

(8) Section 11 (authorizing the Farm Board to enter into price-insurance agreements).

(b) The repeal of section 7 (a) (5) shall not be construed to prohibit the extension, renewal, or refinancing of any loan made thereunder and outstanding on the date of the enactment of this act, but loans to extend, renew, or refinance any such loan shall bear interest rates as determined under section 8 (a) of the Agricultural Marketing Act as amended by section 54 of this act.

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It is with a great deal of pleasure that I read this section whereby loans are renewed or refinanced or extended, and the Farmers National Cooperative Association pays only a reasonable rate of interest, and does not permit the loaning of Government money at one eighth of 1 percent; that that rate will be discontinued.

We have a condition in Nebraska whereby the Farmers National Cooperative Association has built up one of the most damnable relief organizations that the country has ever seen. It was established by my predecessor, and it was an organization upon the acts of which I was elected to Congress. I made an aggressive attack against the acts of the Farmers National Association. The man at the head received $5,000 a year, and he came into my district carrying the banner of the Republican Party. I condemned seriously the activities.

He discharged the manager of the creamery in my district and made it impossible for the creamery to obtain a loan.

He went fishing with a Republican, and after 3 days' fishing came back, and lo and behold, the chairman of the Republican central committee was made manager of the creamery. He never had one day's experience in conducting a creamery, and it resulted in a condition whereby the creamery got into debt to the United States to the extent of $60,000 on a rate of interest of one half of 1 percent. I want to congratulate the committee that we will get rid of C. V. Thatcher, of the Farmers National Association, and men of that type.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 55. Subsection (a) of section 15 of the Agricultural Marketing Act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"(a) As used in this act the term 'cooperative association' means any association in which farmers act together in collectively processing, preparing for market, handling, and/or marketing the farm products of persons so engaged and also means any association in which farmers act together in collectively purchasing, testing, grading, and/or processing their farm and farm-household supplies: Provided, however, That such associations are operated for the mutual benefit of the members thereof as such producers or purchasers and conform to one or both of the following requirements:

"First. That no member of the association is allowed more than 1 vote because of the amount of stock or membership capital he may own therein; and

"Second. That the association does not pay dividends on stock or membership capital in excess of 8 percent per annum.

"And in any case to the following:

"Third. That the association shall not deal in the products of or supplies for nonmembers to an amount greater in value than such as are handled by it for members."

With the following committee amendment:

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HOEPPEL: Page 25, line 2, strike out the following: "8 percent" and insert in lieu thereof the words "12 percent."

Mr. HOEPPEL. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to so many arguments here on this floor in behalf of bankers and loan associations that I have become inoculated with bankeritis, and I am now very sympathetic toward the bankers of America. That is why I have introduced this amendment increasing the rate of interest. I recognize that the American farmer still has a dollar or two in his pocket, therefore he can afford to pay a high rate of interest.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOEPPEL. In just a moment. I recognize that over on the other side of the Capitol they are investigating a certain individual who is unable to pay income tax. He is a banker. I am in favor of this gentleman having some sort of increased revenue. That is why I have raised this to 12 percent. It is not sufficient that the people who are to handle this fund are to be tax exempt, but they are going to reap profits at the expense of the American agriculturists. And I think as long as the farmer is aided, the banker should be in a position to get his also. I hope this amendment is not agreed to, in fact, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. FERNANDEZ. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. FERNANDEZ: On page 25, section 55, strike out lines 4, 5, 6, and 7, reading as follows:

"And in any case to the following:

"Third. That the association shall not deal in the products of or supplies for nonmembers to an amount greater in value than such as are handled by it for members."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that all debate upon this section and all amendments thereto close in 7 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FERNANDEZ. Mr. Chairman, in support of this amendment, I desire to submit the following telegram, which has been received from Mr. Russell Clark, president of the New Orleans Cotton Exchange:

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAM FROM MR. RUSSELL CLARK, PRESIDENT OF THE NEW ORLEANS COTTON EXCHANGE

MAY 29, 1933.

Pending bill revising Agricultural Marketing Act provides for continuance of privilege of tax-exempt and tax-subsidized cooperatives to buy and sell and merchandise nonmember cotton in direct competition with taxpaying business. This sort of thing kills the ability of private business to pay taxes to Government and does not help the farmer. The cotton trade can demonstrate this fully. Recent disastrous experience resulting from Government-financed co-ops certainly appears to be sufficient evidence of enormous harm to be anticipated. Interest of Government as well as of the cotton trade requires that this matter receive most careful and thorough consideration before any action is taken. We earnestly ask that before such a bill is presented that the cotton trade be given an opportunity to be heard fully.

RUSSELL CLARK,
President New Orleans Cotton Exchange.

In addition to this telegram from the cotton exchange in the cotton-producing section of the United States or the world, I desire to also submit a telegram signed by the following outstanding individuals and firms connected with the American cotton industry:

Essential to the welfare not only of cotton producer but cotton consumer as well is properly balanced market facilities. Tuesday we understand a bill intended to revise the Agricultural Marketing Act will be presented to the House. Said bill contains a provision extending the privilege granted tax-exempt and tax-subsidized cooperatives to buy, sell, deal in, and merchandise nonmember cotton in competition with taxpaying merchants. This character of Government competition opposed to private initiative and enterprise literally dries up the sources from which Government derives tax revenues and does not and cannot benefit the cotton farmer in any way. The cotton farmer's troubles do not arise from any deficiency in the established marketing system but from causes not related to that system. We request and urge that before extending any such privilege the well-informed cotton trade be heard.

Crump & Co.; Fenner, Beane & Ungerleider; Gibert, Henican, Grinnen & Co.; Leslie J. Healy & Co.; McFadden & West; Norman Mayer & Co.; Meric & Claiborne; W. E. Richmond & Co.; Maurice Sterns Sons; Stewart Bros.; Thomas Hobson & Legendre; Tullis Craig & Co.; Wachsman & Wassall; J. J. Williamson & Co.; Wells & Stanton; Mason Smith & Co.; Woodfin & Co.

The recent experience which the American people have had with this class of legislation and the tremendous losses that have been suffered by the Federal Treasury as a result requires no further argument than to merely bring it to the attention of the House. I well understand that this legislation has been on the statute books for the past decade and this fact is advanced for those who would emphasize its incorporation in the pending bill. In view of recent experiences, however, I believe that Congress is warranted in striking it from the pending measure. I sincerely trust that it will be stricken from the bill and that legitimate, private enterprise will be relieved from this insuperable class of competition.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FERNANDEZ. Yes.

Mr. HOPE. If I understand what the gentleman has in mind, I do not believe his amendment will accomplish his purpose. As I understand it, the gentleman wishes to prevent cooperatives getting Federal assistance from dealing with any nonmember product.

Mr. FERNANDEZ. We don't want them to come in competition with the cotton merchants that buy in the open market. I think my amendment clears it pretty well.

Mr. HOPE. If the gentleman's amendment should be agreed to, it would mean that there would be no limit whatever on the amount of nonmember products that these associations could deal in. As it is now they can deal in not more than 49 percent of nonmember products. If the amendment should prevail they could deal in unlimited amounts of nonmember products.

Mr. FERNANDEZ. In any event, it is the law now (49 Stats., p. 88), so that it really does not matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HART. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. HART: Page 25, line 7, strike out "such as are handled by it for members" and insert "10 percent of the value of all products and supplies handled by it."

Mr. HART. Mr. Chairman, I offer this amendment for the purpose of putting on an equality these cooperatives in operating with the ordinary line of business. Under the provisions of this act and the previous Agricultural Marketing Act, they were able to borrow money at very low rates of interest, rates with which the private individual could not compete. Then they went into the market and operated not only with a low rate of interest but with a bonus obtained by reloaning that money, and they were handling nonmembers' goods without a profit, destroying legitimate business. I do not want to hamper the cooperatives, and I leave that 10-percent clause in there so that they can go out and make up units for shipments. For instance, if they lack a certain amount of goods to fill out a carload, they can go out and get nonmember products and fill their shipment.

I am not trying to hamstring them, but they have no right to get low rates of interest and go out and destroy the ordinary business man.

I hope this amendment will be sustained by the House. I know it is practical.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, may we have the amendment reported again?

There being no objection, the Clerk again reported the Hart amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. HART].

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

GENERAL CORPORATE POWERS

SEC. 60. The Central Bank for Cooperatives, and the Production Credit Corporations, the Production Credit Associations, and the Banks for Cooperatives, organized under this act, shall have succession until dissolved in accordance with this or any other act of Congress; shall have power to sue and be sued in any court, to adopt and use a corporate seal, to make contracts, to acquire, hold, and dispose of real and personal property necessary and incident to the conduct of their business, to prescribe fees and charges (which in any case shall be subject to the rules and regulations prescribed by the governor) for loans and other services; and shall have such other powers necessary and incident to carrying out their powers and duties under this or any other act of Congress as may be provided by the governor in their charters or in any amendments thereto. Each such bank, association, or corporation shall, for the purposes of jurisdiction, be deemed a citizen of the State or district within which its principal office is located.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. GILCHRIST: On page 26, line 3, after the period, insert the following: "No district court of the United States shall have jurisdiction of any action or suit by or against any production-credit corporation or production-credit association upon the ground that it was incorporated under this act, or that the United States owns a majority of the stock in it; nor shall any district court of the United States within the land-bank district served by such association or corporation have jurisdiction, by removal or otherwise, of any suit by or against any such association or corporation, except in cases by or against the United States or by or against any officer of the United States, and except in cases of winding up such bank, association, or corporation."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I wish to state that I have consulted most of the members of the Committee on Agriculture and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa is agreeable to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GILCHRIST].

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

UNLAWFUL ACTS AND PENALTIES

SEC. 64. (a) Whoever makes any statement, knowing it to be false, or whoever willfully overvalues any security, for the purpose of influencing in any way the action of the Central Bank for Cooperatives, or a Production Credit Corporation, Production Credit Association, or Bank for Cooperatives, organized under this act, upon any application, advance, discount, purchase, or repurchase agreement, or loan, or any extension thereof by renewal, deferment, or action or otherwise, or the acceptance, release, or substitution of security therefor, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than 2 years, or both.

(b) Whoever (1) falsely makes, forges, or counterfeits any note, debenture, bond, or other obligation, or coupon, in imitation of or purporting to be a note, debenture, bond, or other obligation, or coupon, issued by any such bank, association, or corporation; or (2) passes, utters, or publishes, or attempts to pass, utter, or publish, any false, forged, or counterfeited note, debenture, bond, or other obligation, or coupon, purporting to have been issued by any such bank, association, or corporation, knowing the same to be false, forged, or counterfeited; or (3) falsely alters any note, debenture, bond, or other obligation, or coupon, issued or purporting to have been issued by any such bank, association, or corporation; or (4) passes, utters, or publishes, or attempts to pass, utter, or publish as true, any falsely altered or spurious note, debenture, bond, or other obligation, or coupon, issued or purporting to have been issued by any such bank, association, or corporation, knowing the same to be falsely altered or spurious, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000, or by imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both.

(c) Whoever, being connected in any capacity with any such bank, association, or corporation, (1) embezzles, abstracts, purloins, or willfully misapplies any moneys, funds, securities, or other things of value, whether belonging to it or pledged or otherwise intrusted to it; or (2) with intent to defraud any such bank, association, or corporation, or any other body politic or corporate, or any individual, or to deceive any officer, auditor, or examiner of any such bank, association, or corporation, makes any false entry in any book, report, or statement of or to any such bank, association, or corporation, or draws any order, or issues, puts forth, or assigns any note, debenture, bond, or other obligation, or draft, mortgage, judgment, or decree thereof, shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000, or by imprisonment for not more than 5 years, or both.

(d) The provisions of sections 112, 113, 114, 115, 116, and 117 of the Criminal Code of the United States (U.S.C., title 18, secs. 202 to 207, inclusive), insofar as applicable, are extended to apply to contracts or agreements of any bank, association, or corporation organized under this act, which, for the purposes hereof, shall be held to include advances, loans, discounts, and purchase and repurchase agreements; extensions and renewals thereof; and acceptances, releases, and substitutions of security therefor.

(e) Whoever conspires with another to accomplish any of the acts made unlawful by the preceding provisions of this section shall, on conviction thereof, be subject to the same fine or imprisonment, or both, as is applicable in the case of conviction for doing such unlawful act.

Mr. McGUGIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of seeking information from the chairman of the committee.

What is the judgment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] as to the amount of credit which this bill will ultimately provide? The bill provides for $120,000,000. When the collateral is turned over to the intermediate credit bank what percentage of turnover does the gentleman think there will be?

Mr. JONES. In similar organizations that have been established it has ranged about 5 to 1, and we expect it to range that here.

Mr. McGUGIN. That will be $600,000,000 worth before we get through?

Mr. JONES. That depends altogether on how extensively this may be used. The gentleman understands those uncertainties.

Mr. McGUGIN. On page 27 I notice all obligations incurred under this act shall be tax exempt. So, in the last analysis, we might as well face the fact that this presents an avenue for another $600,000,000 worth of tax-exempt securities. Is that right?

Mr. JONES. Yes. I believe that all issues of tax-exempt securities should be abolished, but so long as the system is in vogue I see no reason for discriminating against agriculture.

Mr. McGUGIN. I can see no reason for discriminating against agriculture, and we are going to accept this bill with those terms; but does the gentleman not believe that, as bad as it may be for the States, municipalities, and Federal Government to issue definite amounts of bonds that are tax exempt, it is a much more dangerous policy to be setting up these side corporations and authorizing them to issue indefinite amounts of securities which will be tax exempt?

Mr. JONES. I do not agree with the policy of issuing them at all; but I do feel that since industry has such an extensive amount already outstanding it is certainly no more than fair that agriculture should have the same right.

Mr. McGUGIN. Certainly. This is equally as decent as the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bonds being tax exempt, but the principle is certainly wrong of allowing these side corporations to issue tax-exempt securities. We know that the $27,000,000,000 of the national debt which will be outstanding at the end of this session of Congress will be tax exempt. We know that the $4,000,000,000 of bonds authorized to be issued in the farm-mortgage relief bill and in the city mortgage relief bill will be tax exempt. That will make $31,000,000,000 of United States securities which we know will be tax exempt. We know that the States and the cities, together with other local governmental units, have outstanding billions of dollars of tax-exempt securities. But what will be the amount of tax-exempt securities issued by these side corporations no man will know. Maybe government can survive in the United States with a major portion of its property tax exempt and with public expenses mounting by the billions of dollars but I doubt it.

Mr. JONES. But certainly they are not tax exempt after the United States gets out of them?

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 71. Paragraph "Sixth", of section 14 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended, is hereby repealed.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 31, line 17, after the word "is", strike out the words "hereby repealed" and insert:

"Sixth. To accept as additional security for any loan to any borrower under this act, or any installment on any such loan, any personal property which is exempt from execution upon judgment under the laws of the State in which the land with respect to which the mortgage is given is situated."

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the chairman of the committee a question in connection with the committee amendment. This amendment authorizes but does not require additional security for the postponement of any installment?

Mr. JONES. That is correct.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. It is purely optional with the Federal land bank?

Mr. JONES. That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. PETERSON: Page 31, line 24, strike out the period and insert a comma and the following:

"Loans may be made under this act and the Federal Farm Loan Act and amendments thereto, notwithstanding the fact that the land or property upon which such loan is made is located in a county, improvement, or tax district which is in default of its bonds."

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the amendment is not germane to the paragraph, to the section, or to the bill as a whole.

The CHAIRMAN. The Parliamentarian assures the Chair that this amendment is subject to the point of order. The committee amendment has already been agreed to.

The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 78. Section 31 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended (U.S.C., title 12, sec. 986), is amended by adding at the end thereof a new paragraph, as follows:

"Any mortgagee who shall knowingly make any false statement in any paper, proposal, or letter, relating to the sale of any mortgage, to any Federal land bank under the provisions of section 13 of this act, as amended, or any appraiser provided for in this act who shall willfully overvalue any land securing such mortgage, shall be punished by a fine of not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment not exceeding 1 year, or both."

With the following committee amendment:

SEC. 79. Section 13 of the Federal Farm Loan Act, as amended (U.S.C., title 12, sec. 781), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following new paragraph:

"Fourteenth. To enter into agreements with national farm-loan associations of the district under the terms of which losses incurred and gains realized on account of the disposition of lands covered by a defaulted mortgage endorsed by such association will be shared equally by the bank and the association."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 83. The Farm Credit Administration shall have a seal, as adopted by the Governor, which shall be judicially noticed.

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk, and with the Chair's indulgence before the amendment is read I will make a short explanation.

This amendment relates to section 36 of Public Act No. 10, the farm omnibus bill which we passed and which was approved May 12, relating to the loans made to levee, drainage, and irrigation districts.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. That was in cases where they were completed projects.

Mr. DOXEY. Absolutely. I would have taken this up with the gentleman under any ordinary conditions. Let me say this is a clarifying amendment, clarifying the language in existing law. It was sent to our committee by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, which has to administer this portion of the law, and may have been sent there, possibly, in the absence of the gentleman from New York.

Section 36 provides for loans to drainage and similar districts to the extent of $50,000,000. This amendment enables the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, as they say, to expedite the administration of this section through a clarification of the language. In other words, for example, where we said "bonds" they say "bonds and other obligations."

If my distinguished friend from New York will permit me, I will tell him just the situation. To be frank with the gentleman, I think the amendment is subject to a point of order. I do not think a point of order will be made by any gentleman if he understands that this amendment already is in the independent offices bill in the Senate, but there is no telling when that bill will be passed, as there are many controversial matters in it, involving veterans' appropriations, and other things of a controversial nature. No doubt it could be worked out satisfactorily with the conferees, but the thought of those who are interested in accelerating the activities of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation in administering the law that is so vital to these distressed districts was that if we adopted it here on this act, when this bill gets to the Senate, which we hope it speedily will, it will meet very little opposition; it will be agreed upon, the law will be clarified, and we will be enabled to operate more advantageously and quickly, in my judgment.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOXEY. I shall be delighted to.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. The attitude on our side is one, of course, of wanting to cooperate in every way.

Mr. DOXEY. I may say the gentleman has proven it.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. And I believe it will be the testimony of all Members present that we have tried to cooperate, but here is brought up an important matter with no Member on our side knowing anything about it; we have to just take it on faith, and I would take almost anything in the United States on the strength of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DOXEY] say-so, but it is the way of doing the thing that is wrong.

Mr. DOXEY. I readily agree with the gentleman. I may say to the gentleman that I did not intend to present this amendment as an amendment to this legislation at all, but I had a short conference with Senator ROBINSON of Arkansas, who is especially interested in this matter, and it was suggested that if the amendment were added to this bill it would expedite matters. I am sure when the gentleman understands the amendment he will support it. It was before our committee and for some reason or other it was referred to me to look into. I was not there at that particular time. If there is any objection I bow graciously and can appreciate the gentleman's position, but it is a matter of importance, even if this is not the proper way of handling it. It can be fixed up in conference.

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOXEY. I yield.

Mr. HOPE. Do I understand the gentleman to say it is simply a clarifying amendment?

Mr. DOXEY. I say it is simply a clarifying amendment because it does not change any of the principles. The gentleman is familiar with section 36 with reference to the $50,000,000 that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is to loan to these distressed levee districts, drainage districts, and drainage and levee districts.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. If the gentleman will yield right there, I should like to make certain I get the import of the amendment, and I do not think any man can get it with the matter brought up in this way, but as I recall the farm bill it was upon completed projects, was it not?

Mr. DOXEY. Absolutely.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. And this carries out that proposition?

Mr. DOXEY. Certainly. No project other than a completed project is included in the original act. If the gentleman will permit my amendment to be read, and I will furnish him the law, he will see that the changes are such as these: Where we said "assessments" they say "and assessments", and where there are ad valorem taxes and assessments the amendment makes them available as charges. Where we say "bonds" they say "or other obligations." This amendment was drafted by the legal division of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation which has to administer its provisions.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be given 2 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Let the amendment first be reported.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DOXEY: On page 36, after line 11, insert the following:

"SEC. 84. Section 36, Public Act No. 10, Seventy-third Congress, approved May 12, 1933, is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 36. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation is authorized and empowered to make loans as hereinafter provided, in an aggregate amount not exceeding $50,000,000, to or for the benefit of drainage districts, levee districts, levee and drainage districts, irrigation districts, and similar districts duly organized under the laws of any State, and to or for the benefit of political subdivisions of States, which prior to the date of enactment of this act have completed projects devoted chiefly to the improvement of lands for agricultural purposes. Such loans shall be made for the purpose of enabling any such district or political subdivision (hereafter referred to as the "borrower") to reduce and refinance its outstanding indebtedness incurred in connection with any such projects, and shall be subject to the same terms and conditions as loans made under section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, as amended; except that (1) the term of any such loan shall not exceed 40 years; (2) each such loan shall be secured by bonds, notes, or other obligations which are a lien on the real property within the project or on the assessments, taxes, or other charges imposed by the borrower pursuant to State law, or by such other collateral as may be acceptable to the Corporation; (3) the borrower shall agree not to issue during the term of the loan any other bonds so secured except with the consent of the Corporation; (4) the borrower shall agree, insofar as it lawfully may, to pay to the Corporation, until all bonds or other obligations of the borrower acquired by the Corporation are retired, an amount equal to the amount by which the assessments, taxes, and other charges collected by the borrower exceed the cost of operation and maintenance of the project and maturities of interest and principal on its outstanding obligations; and (5) the borrower shall agree, to the satisfaction of the Corporation, to reduce, insofar as it lawfully may, the annual taxes, assessments, and other charges imposed by it for or on account of the project by an amount proportional to the reduction in the corresponding annual requirements for principal and interest of its outstanding indebtedness by reason of the operation of this section. No loan shall be made under this section until the Reconstruction Finance Corporation (A) has caused an appraisal to be made of the property securing and/or underlying the outstanding bonds of the applicant, (B) has determined that the project of the applicant is economically sound, and (C) has been satisfied that an agreement has been entered into between the applicant and holders of its outstanding bonds or other obligations under which the applicant will be able to purchase or refund all or a major portion of such bonds or other obligations at a price determined by the Corporation to be reasonable after taking into consideration the average market price of such bonds over the 6-month period ending March 1, 1933, and under which a substantial reduction will be brought about in the amount of the outstanding indebtedness of the applicant.'"

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order for the purpose of asking the gentleman a question.

When this legislation about drainage districts was before the House there was put upon it an amendment that I thought was necessary for my part of the country, up in the State of Iowa. The committee agreed to it, the House agreed to it, it went to conference and then when the bill came back the amendment had disappeared from it. I should now like to ask the gentleman from Mississippi, under my reservation of the point of order, if he has objection to putting my amendment into his present amendment?

Mr. DOXEY. The gentleman's amendment relates to that principle of law known as the "last faithful acre"—is that the amendment the gentleman refers to?

Mr. GILCHRIST. Yes; in part at least.

Mr. DOXEY. My position now is just what it has always been. I did not feel that the gentleman's amendment added or detracted one bit in the world from that legislation, because of the mere legal phraseology, and for my part this is not my amendment here. This is an amendment that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation says will enable them to more effectively administer the law as it was passed and as it is now on the books.

Mr. GILCHRIST. Mr. Chairman, I shall have to insist on the point of order.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman reserve it?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I will reserve it further to hear from the gentleman, but I wish to call attention to the gentleman's own statement that the amendment I proposed neither added to nor subtracted from the bill. Then what objection does he have to it? However, I shall reserve further the point of order at the request of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FISH. I only ask the gentleman to do this because I should like to hear a little more discussion from the chairman of the committee as to just what this accomplishes. It may be that after hearing from the chairman of the committee the objection will be withdrawn. It may accomplish what the gentleman has in mind and what some of the rest of us have in mind. Could the gentleman give us a statement about exactly what this accomplishes?

Mr. JONES. I may say that on this particular proposition I have relied upon the investigation and judgment of the gentlemen who are interested in the proposition within the limitations of the amount which we are willing to allow. I understand from the letter which came from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation that it will be practically impossible for them to make loans under the law as we passed it and the restrictions under which they operate under this act. They simply want this for the purpose of enabling them to carry out the powers granted them in the other act to make these loans. However, I have not studied this particular phase of the matter as have these gentlemen who represent districts that have these projects and are familiar with them, and for that reason I was leaving the matter largely to the discretion of the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. JONES. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand the situation, it is almost an entirely new bill that has been brought in here and no one knows anything about it, not even the members of the committee. It certainly is not right to offer this as an amendment and have it put through here unless the members of the committee at least know exactly what they are doing. I think it is subject to a point of order.

Mr. JONES. I may say to the gentleman that we had not intended to offer this amendment, but the request came from the other side with the statement that the matter may be delayed over there, and they hoped that it might go on here. I have no particular interest in the matter except to give the gentleman a chance to present it.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield for a short statement?

Mr. GILCHRIST. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. May I say that I noticed this amendment in the RECORD Saturday. It was offered in the Senate by Senator ROBINSON of Arkansas. I undertook to compare it with the section of the act as we passed it in the House and my judgment from the examination I made is that this is a clarifying amendment in the interest of administration. I could not see where it made any change whatsoever in the substantive law. My colleague from Mississippi [Mr. DOXEY] conferred with me and stated that the amendment which Senator ROBINSON had proposed in the Senate and as carried in the RECORD of last Saturday had been submitted to his committee and at his suggestion I compared the amendment with the law as we passed it here and it struck me that it was merely clarifying and was in the interest of good administration and that the amendment should be adopted because it made no change whatever in substantive law.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Undoubtedly, that is all true, and there is no one in the world who would depend more on the word of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DOXEY] and the chairman of the committee than myself, but I say it is unfair to the members of the committee not to be fully consulted so that we may thoroughly understand all these matters. Whether it is one man's fault or another's, this matter is sprung on us here entirely unknown to us and it is unfair to ask us to go along on a thing like this.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Yes.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I am not a member of the committee and I can appreciate very thoroughly just what the gentleman says and can appreciate his position in the matter and I have no fault to find with it. However, it does strike me that inasmuch as this is not an amendment personally introduced by my colleague [Mr. DOXEY] but comes at the request of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, the agency of the Government that is to administer this act, there is at least some excuse for the manner in which it is presented here.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. There is no excuse in the world when the members of the committee do not have full access to the facts and know all that goes with it in order that they may form a mature judgment about the matter.

Mr. DOXEY. The gentleman and myself have been on this committee for some years. The gentleman was on the committee before I was, and there has never been any disposition, I think the gentleman will agree, on my part to do anything except to have a frank and free discussion of all matters.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Absolutely. I would bank on the gentleman from Mississippi.

Mr. DOXEY. I appreciate that and the gentleman from New York knows what a high regard I have for him, to be frank about it. The matter was referred to our committee when we were in the midst of the hearings on this particular bill and I then took occasion to look into it and found that it was going to be handled on the other side of the Capitol. I did not feel at that time that it was any use to burden my colleagues, and further that the Senate intended to put it in the independent offices appropriation bill, and that it would be approved of in the conference report, and that would end it.

Now, it developed—and that is one reason that I have not discussed it with anybody except those interested in the Senate procedure—but now it has developed that the independent offices bill will likely be tied up in the Senate for some time. If we do not start it here in the House and place it as an amendment on some legislation here, the Reconstruction Finance Corporation will not likely make any loan to these distressed districts out of this $50,000,000 appropriation.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. It is my understanding that this does not close the door; it can be put on any other bill that may come up.

Mr. DOXEY. Yes; it can be put on another bill, but the next bill may have hard sailing in the Senate. We are fortunate in having the present bill go through the House without any trouble. I appreciate the gentleman's position, and I have nothing but the kindest feeling if the gentleman insists on his point of order.

Mr. HOPE. Let me say that this bill has to pass the Senate. Would it not be better to wait until it gets over there and let the Senate put this amendment on, and in the meantime the committee here can study the amendment and know something about it, and when it comes back from conference it can then be acted upon?

Mr. DOXEY. The gentleman's thought is to let the Senate put the amendment on?

Mr. HOPE. Yes.

Mr. DOXEY. I think that is a wholesome suggestion, and the gentleman will find me willing to go along with him in that way.

Mr. GILCHRIST. The gentleman made the statement that my amendment to this legislation is neither harmful nor helpful; then, how can there be any objection to it, and will the gentleman favor its being put on in conference?

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I insist on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

The Clerk completed the reading of the bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Chairman, I move that the Committee do now rise and report the bill back to the House with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the bill as amended do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. SHALLENBERGER, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill (H.R. 5790) to provide for organizations within the Farm Credit Administration to make loans for the production and marketing of agricultural products, to amend the Federal Farm Loan Act, to amend the Agricultural Marketing Act, to provide a market for obligations of the United States, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and that the bill as amended do pass.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the bill and all amendments to final passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

There being no demand for a separate vote, the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. JONES, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 40 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Judiciary, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

PROTOCOLS OF ZION

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 3 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, on Monday last the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] made some remarks which reflected upon the people of a great race. Whether intended so or not, those remarks did a gross injustice to the Jewish people, who have contributed so much toward the development and the progress of our own country and of every other country in which they have resided. I know of no people, members of no race, who have been more law-abiding, more patriotic, and more loyal to the government in which they live and to the flag of that country. I hold in my hand a telegram from a distinguished citizen, Dr. Cyrus Adler, president of the American Jewish Committee, which I shall read to the House. It is addressed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives and reads as follows:

PHILADELPHIA, PA., May 30, 1933.

SPEAKER, HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C.:

In view of the statement made in the House of Representatives on May 29 by Mr. McFADDEN, in which he referred to the "so-called 'protocols of Zion'", I deem it my duty to call attention to the fact that these "protocols" are a forgery, as was proved by the Constantinople correspondent of the London Times years ago. Mr. McFADDEN also referred in connection with the so-called "protocols" to the Dearborn Independent. Mr. Henry Ford, the then proprietor of the Dearborn Independent, stated in a written communication, dated June 30, 1927, "I confess that I am deeply mortified that this journal, which is intended to be constructive and not destructive, has been made the medium for resurrecting exploded fictions and for giving currency to the so-called 'protocols' of the wise men of Zion, which have been demonstrated, as I learn, to be gross forgery." In view of the fact that the press reports that Mr. McFADDEN quoted at some length from the protocols, I trust that the House of Representatives will be willing to place this message in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, so that the report of its proceedings shall not be disfigured by extracts from a forged document.

CYRUS ADLER,
President American Jewish Committee.

In view of that telegram and the facts stated, I hope that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] may see fit to withdraw the remarks to which it refers.

JEWISH PERSECUTION

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I submit a statement by myself in answer to the remarks on May 29 by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN].

Hitlerism has shown its hand on the floor of the House. That untimely speech delivered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] on Monday, May 29, has spread it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

It is almost unbelievable that a person of otherwise sane views, and as seemingly in possession of all his faculties as is the gentleman from Pennsylvania, should stoop to such vulgar tactics in assailing the Jews of the United States and the world.

I only wish the Congressman had occasion to read some of the latest books on Jewish life. They would prove to him, beyond possibility of a doubt, that far from being the "money power" of the world, the Jews are really on the other side of the ledger. Jewish millionaires are few and far between. It is futile to speak of a Jewish money power, because such a power does not exist and never existed. The number of Jewish millionaires can almost be counted on the fingers of one hand and by no means do they compare with the wealth and opulence one may find among the "gentiles."

Of course, in this year of grace 1933, one must be very dense indeed to give any credence to the alleged "Protocols of the Elders of Zion." This publication, from which our friend Henry Ford some 10 years ago so copiously quoted in the now defunct Dearborn Independent, has gone the way of all flesh, and no sane person today believes that there is a shred of truth in the alleged document.

This book was written by a Russian, half-crazy student, and was copiously imitated on the European Continent by nations and races which should have known better. The story itself is so weird as to defy all intelligent description. According to this tale, the Elders of Zion are the heads of the Jewish people and presumably the great Jewish money lenders. They plot the destruction of the whole world, so that the Jewish money power may come to rule the universe. The Jewish bankers are supposed to meet in subterranean cellars on nights when the moon is not shining and all proceedings are so secret that the bankers do not even know each other. Nevertheless, they apparently keep a record of their doings and pass resolutions condemning the gentiles and exalting the Jews. Not only do they pass resolutions but they plot how to destroy the Christian world and how to erect in its place a Jewish world, where the Jews will have all the money and the gentiles will have to slave and toil for them. A beautiful picture, is it not? Such is alleged at least to be the avowed program of the "damnable Jewish plotters." And the gentleman from Pennsylvania, presumably a sensible person, believes in it.

When these fairy tales about the plottings of the Jewish bankers were first told, the world was amazed to see Henry Ford take it up in his newspaper, and every week send a broadside in the world with more and more details about the Jews and their "nefarious" practices. I wonder if the gentleman from Pennsylvania is not going to read into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD from day to day other chapters from the famous "protocols."

I have not before me any figures which would indicate how many Jews reside in the gentleman's congressional district or cast their votes there, but it would surely make very pleasant reading for his constituents when they will discover that their Congressman believes in fairy tales, if the fairy tales were at least of a pleasant and charming nature. But no; the story told in the "protocols" is apt, in the language of Shakespeare, "to make your blood curdle, your hair stand up, and your frame shiver." To believe the story one must think that the Jews are not only wicked and cruel but a race of bluebeards and vampires combined. Such is the story told in these nefarious "protocols."

Well, the time has come that our race, so maligned and unkindly dealt with, should take a decided stand against further persecution. The action of the gentleman from Pennsylvania can be termed nothing else but persecution of the Jewish race. To single out the Jewish people of America who as a group are responsible for this country going off the gold standard is as wild a thought and as mad an idea as ever was conceived by the human brain. It is almost unbelievable for an idea of this kind to have lodged in the mind of a Member of the American Congress. In my 11 years of service in this House I have never yet, either in public or private contact with the Members, been aware of any such stupid ignorance. The act of a Member of Congress charging the people of my race with being responsible for financial upset in the United States is nothing short of ignorant stupidity. The Jewish people of the United States have always led a law-abiding, patriotic existence. They have done their share, and more, in fighting for this country, in cherishing its ideals, and working for its upbuilding. Wherever any field of human endeavor in this United States is touched you will find a Jewish name actively engaged in the promotion of everything that is good and salutary. I have no doubt that even the gentleman from Pennsylvania must have met in his life and been associated with many members of the Jewish race, and I do not believe that he would find objection to be raised personally against the many splendid men and women of the Jewish race with whom he had come into contact at one time or another in his private or public life.

I believe if the gentleman from Pennsylvania will reflect, he will undoubtedly find that he has grievously erred in making the remarks which he uttered in this House on Monday, May 29. I hope he will delete his speech from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

To recapitulate what the Jewish people of this country have done for its upbuilding and development would require volumes. Books have been written and are to be found in any library to which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has access, which will show him how the Jews have fought in every war this country waged, from the Revolutionary War down to the World War. We had Jewish soldiers and sailors in every battlefield, we had Jewish men and women in every profession and in every trade and industry. We have rich Jews and poor Jews, Jews more blessed with this world's goods, and Jews on the brink of starvation. We have good and bad. By all means dismiss from your mind any thought that the Jews are responsible for any financial legislation which this House must enact from time to time.

At this time, I wish to add my protest against any attempt to make the floor of this House the battle ground for anti-Semitic propaganda. It must not spread. Any attempt to indulge in it here should be nipped in the bud.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes in reply to a statement made by a colleague of mine day before yesterday in relation to a resolution which I introduced in the House on Monday.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object. Will the gentleman yield to me for a minute and a half?

Mr. TINKHAM. Yes.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, in further reference to the telegram read by our distinguished leader [Mr. BYRNS] in relation to the matter put in the RECORD by Mr. MCFADDEN, I would like to make a brief statement. An investigation was made by the London Times some years ago of the matter quoted by Mr. MCFADDEN. They found out that it was a forgery. The same matter was subsequently published in the Dearborn Independent; Henry Ford later repudiated and apologized for its publication. This was the excerpt placed in the RECORD by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN]. I think in justice to the accuracy of the RECORD, the matter should be expunged. If I may be recognized to make such a motion at this time, I will make it. I move that the entire quotation be expunged from the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. SNELL. I hope the gentleman will not make that request at this time. I think the matter should be taken under more consideration. I should have to object to that at this time.

Mr. BOYLAN. I am sure the gentleman would not object to having the forgery eliminated from the RECORD.

Mr. SNELL. Certainly not, but there is a good deal more to the gentleman's speech than what the gentleman from New York has referred to at this time. I think it would be unfair to make the motion.

Mr. BOYLAN. I do not ask to have the entire speech stricken out. I merely ask to have this quotation stricken out which appears at the top of the second column on page 4591 of the RECORD.

Mr. SNELL. As a matter of fact I have no definite information one way or the other in regard to it, and I am not in favor of anyone putting anything in the RECORD that is not founded on fact. At a later date perhaps the gentleman may make that motion but at present I shall object.

Mr. BOYLAN. All I ask for is to expunge the quotation in the gentleman's speech, the forged quotation which was repudiated by and apologized for by the paper that published it.

Mr. SNELL. I should like a little more opportunity to look into the matter.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

FARM CREDIT ACT OF 1933—EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days within which to extend their remarks upon the Farm Credit Act of 1933, which we just passed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, I am watching very closely the movement of the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wallace, in making appointments of the men who are to compose the machinery to operate or administer the farm relief bill, introduced by me, and known as H.R. 3835.

I introduced a domestic allotment bill about 12 months ago known as the "Wilson plan." It was my opinion at that time that the allotment plan would work splendidly and helpfully to farmers on cotton and wheat. I stated, when H.R. 3835 was up for consideration in the House, that if same were properly administered, and if manufacturers and farmers would join in heartily with the Agricultural Department in administering the bill, it would work successfully and farm prices could easily be advanced to pre-war prices.

I have contended all along, and now contend, that until farm prices are put on a fair basis in line with prices which farmers have to pay for that which they buy, normal prosperity will be long drawn out. It is also my contention that if something is not done to bring about fair prices for farm products, in line with prices that farmers have to pay for that which they buy, the millions which the Government is now lending to railroads and other corporations, and putting into various relief programs, will be just like putting that much money into a rat hole.

The bill should have been passed and put into operation before farmers began to plant cotton. Farmers then could have complied with the requirements of reducing acreage and production. This cannot be done now unless farmers would plow up a certain acreage of cotton which has been planted and is now growing. Farmers will not plow up cotton that is now growing, and it would be foolish on their part to do so.

The allotment plan can and should be put into operation at once. I want to try to show you just how this can be done, even though farmers cannot, as stated, reduce acreage and production, which was contemplated when the bill was first written. For instance, Farmer Jones, who planted 150 acres of cotton in 1932 and produced 100 bales of cotton, would have cut his acreage down to 100 acres and his production to 70 bales if he had come in under the plan before planting his 1933 cotton crop. This would be in line with the 30-percent reduction of acreage and production under the bill. Inasmuch as Farmer Jones did not have the opportunity to come in and comply, as just stated, we will take for granted that he has planted this year his same acreage, and with a normal season will produce the same number of bales as produced in 1932, which was 100 bales.

I contend that Farmer Jones can now come in by making an agreement that if he produces 100 bales, inasmuch as he has already planted 150 acres, as he did in 1932, he will offer for sale only the same number of bales in the fall of 1933 that he would have agreed to produce in the first instance, had he come in before the cotton was planted, which would be 70 bales. He would also have to agree to carry over the 30 bales to be used as a part of his allotment for 1934.

Naturally, this 30 bales, carried over, would have to be taken into consideration in connection with the reduction in production according to the amount of the surplus on hand at the beginning of the year 1934.

Farmer Jones would be permitted to carry this 30 bales on his own farm, subject to check by the officials of the Agricultural Department, or he could warehouse and borrow money thereon to help pay his 1933 obligations or help finance his 1934 crop. There is no difference in this plan and the one contemplated under the bill, if the bill had been put into operation before cotton was planted, except the Department and the farmer would have to take into consideration a 2-year agreement, 1933–34, instead of an agreement for 1933, under the original plan. Suppose Farmer Jones has 25 bales of cotton actually on hand at this time and wanted to come in. He should be permitted to do so and he should be given the immediate benefits under the allotment plan. He would have to agree to make the proper reduction in 1934 to take care of same, and use the 30 bales over production in 1933 as a part of his 1934 allotment. Jones should also agree to carry 25 additional bales out of the 70 bales allowed him for 1933, because he was permitted to sell the 25 bales on hand, and received the allotment benefits thereon. This would save carrying charges to Mr. Jones and give him considerable extra purchasing power.

Suppose all agreements as outlined by me have been entered into on the part of Mr. Jones, and he sells his 25 bales at once on the open market in the usual way. I take it for granted that 50 percent of the production of cotton will be consumed domestically and therefore Mr. Jones should receive the benefit of the adjustment charge under the allotment plan; that is, the difference between the world market price at the time of the sale of his cotton and the prewar price, which was 13 cents.

Jones sells 25 bales on hand at once. He will be permitted to sell 45 bales next fall out of his 1933 crop, which will make his 70 bales, or his allotment for 1933, or up until the beginning of the operating period of 1934.

Statement of sale

25 bales at 9 cents (today's price, or $45 per bale)	$1,125
4 cents per pound, difference between today's price and pre-war price, on 12½ bales	250
Total	1,375

The benefits derived from the adjustment charge could be divided into two portions, one half payable to Mr. Jones at the time of the sale of the cotton, and the other half within 6 months therefrom. Mr. Jones will be in the following position in the fall of 1933: He will have 45 bales of cotton for sale out of his 1933 crop, added to the 25 bales, previously sold, making his total allotment of 70 bales. The balance of his 1933 production, according to agreement, would be used in his allotment for 1934. It is impossible to work out a plan whereby you can actually control the production of cotton, except by applying from year to year a certain reduction in acreage and production of cotton which would take care of any surplus that may be on hand.

Perhaps you will state that inasmuch as Jones will have to carry over 25 bales to take the place of the 25 bales sold prior to the gathering of the 1933 crop and the 30 bales of overproduction this year, his reduction for 1934 would have to take care of not only the 30 bales, but the 25 bales, which would be excessive.

Mr. Jones would not be required to make any cut in his acreage or production to take care of the 25 bales carried over to take the place of the 25 that he was permitted to sell, but he would not be permitted to sell this 25 bales carried over except in connection with his 1934 allotment. Therefore, if he does not take care of this 25 bales in reducing his production in 1934, he would have just that many more bales to carry into 1935, which could be used in his 1935 allotment.

I am going to withhold any comment on the appointments made to date by the Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Wallace, for the purpose of administering this legislation. However, I am fearful that the machinery that is now being made up from day to day, according to the appointments already made, is getting topheavy with ——— (?). I will withhold the balance of this statement until the machinery has been completed and a program outlined for the administration or operation of this legislation.

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, we are limiting ourselves to 2 hours' debate on this bill to provide organizations within the Farm Credit Administration to make loans for the production and marketing of farm products, to improve the Federal Farm Loan Act and the Farm Marketing Act. I congratulate the able chairman of the Committee on Agriculture, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. JONES] and his colleagues and the Members of the House and the American people on this happy and fortunate state of affairs.

In former Congresses most individual Members would have stood on the floor and talked for over 2 hours, some of them perhaps for twice that length of time, and debated this bill for weeks and months, while we dispose of it here today in a few hours of time. It is simply another remarkable demonstration of the speed and expedition with which this Congress is discharging its duties to the American people. "Speed and more speed" is the challenge from the White House, and we are meeting it nobly and patriotically. We do not wonder that a wave of enthusiasm is sweeping over the country. Just a few days ago I received a letter from a Republican constituent of mine out in the State of Washington proposing that the name of our State be changed to Roosevelt.

Needless to say, I favor this bill as a valuable supplement and adjunct to the other farm-relief measures which we have already enacted during this session. They will do all that can be done by legislation to restore agriculture in this country. During the past 12 years the farmers have received but little more than promises; now they are finally assured of substantial aid, and with the recovery of business, which is commencing in all sections of the country, we have reason to hope for better prices for farm products and some degree of prosperity for agriculture.

INVESTIGATION OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

Mr. COX, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following resolution (H.Res. 146) for printing under the rule:

House Resolution 146

Resolved, That for the purpose of obtaining information necessary as a basis for legislation, the Committee on Civil Service, as a whole or by subcommittee, is authorized to investigate the Civil Service Commission, the heads of all the departments, commissions, and independent offices, to determine whether the third paragraph of section 2 of the act of January 16, 1883, being "An act to regulate and improve the civil service of the United States", as follows:

"Third, appointments to the public service aforesaid in the departments at Washington shall be apportioned among the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia upon the basis of population as ascertained at the last preceding census", has been enforced and whether each State has its quota of Federal employees in the District of Columbia in the several departments, commissions, or independent offices, as required by said act.

The committee shall report to the House the results of its investigation, including such recommendation for legislation as it deems advisable.

The committee or any subcommittee thereof is authorized to hold such hearings, within the District of Columbia, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, and to take such testimony and report its recommendations to the House.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] asks unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, if I understood the gentleman's request, he desired time in which to reply to a statement made by his colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. TREADWAY] with reference to Mr. Norman H. Davis.

Mr. TINKHAM. That is true.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, at the present time Mr. Davis is diplomatic representative of the Government of the United States, conducting very delicate and responsible duties abroad for the Government of the United States. It seems to me it is very untimely action, under those circumstances, to attack the position and probably the character and reputation of our present ambassador abroad, and I imagine that is what the gentleman expects to do. If that is the gentleman's purpose, I shall have to object.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; I yield.

Mr. FISH. I do not know what my colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] is going to say, but the gentleman has been for 20 years a Member of this House of Representatives. The gentleman holds a responsible position in his party and upon the Committee on Foreign Affairs. Certainly, the gentleman from Alabama, one of the most distinguished Members of this House, does not want to refuse opportunity to another Member of long and distinguished service to say whatever he desires on his own responsibility on the floor of the House, because if the gentleman objects he would be objecting and cutting off a Member from expressing his own views on this floor, and this is the proper place, if they are to be said to the country, and not in the press.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman's remarks will probably be predicated upon recent disclosures with reference to the Senate investigation.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I yield.

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman withhold that for just a moment? I have been very generous here, and I, individually, have never objected to any man's making his own statement on the floor of the House. I do not know what the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] is about to say. As the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] says, he has been here a great many years——

Mr. O'BRIEN. Mr. Speaker, I still object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I was reserving the right to object.

Mr. SNELL. If that is going to be the attitude on the other side——

Mr. BANKHEAD. I merely reserved the right to object.

Mr. SNELL. But there are a half dozen objections being raised.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

Mr. SNELL. Two can play at that same game.

MODIFICATION OF POSTAGE RATES AND EXTENSION OF GASOLINE TAX

Mr. DOUGHTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the conferees on the part of the House may have until midnight tonight to file a report on the bill (H.R. 5040) to extend the gasoline tax and modify postage rates, and so forth.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. DOUGHTON]?

Mr. SNELL. We ought to object, but we will not.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is heard.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a Memorial Day address delivered by my colleague, Mr. COLMER, at Charleston, W.Va.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KENNEY]?

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, I object.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. ADAMS, for the balance of the week, on account of important business.

To Mr. BOLAND (at the request of Mr. DELANEY), on account of illness.

To Mr. GAVAGAN (at the request of Mr. KENNEDY), on account of illness in family.

To Mr. LANZETTA, indefinitely, on account of illness.

To Mr. MANSFIELD, for today, on account of illness.

To Mr. BRUNNER, for today, on account of important business.

COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE

The Senate resumed the consideration of the nomination of Guy T. Helvering, of Kansas, to be Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, yesterday an agreement was entered into to vote at 3 o'clock on the pending nomination, the time to be equally divided between those who favor and those who oppose the nomination. I ask unanimous consent, for the convenience of the Chair and the Senate, that the time of those who favor the nomination may be controlled by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] and for those who oppose the nomination by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Arkansas? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, in view of the unanimous-consent agreement, inasmuch as 15 minutes have elapsed since the Senate convened, I assume that the time will be limited to 3¾ hours.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifteen minutes having elapsed, each side will have 1 hour and 52½ minutes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I want to apologize to the Senate for taking up so much time on this nomination, but in justification I desire to say that I think I am the only member of the committee who heard all the testimony in the case and attended all the hearings.

When the recess was taken last night I had finished reading a letter, appearing on page 4764 of the RECORD, from one W. D. Vincent, and I had called the attention of the Senate to the fact that the committee declined to let this letter be put in the record. The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], when I had completed reading the letter, stated as follows:

> The Senator is reading now from a letter which the committee refused to allow to go into the record, because the man who is alleged to have written it has been dead for 15 years, and nobody proved that it was his letter, nobody who read it ever saw his handwriting, there is not a word of evidence in the record to show that this man wrote the letter, and the Senator himself does not know that he wrote it.

I desire to call attention to two things in the record with respect to that statement of the Senator from Kentucky. There will be found in the committee hearings at page 96 the following testimony. Mr. Lamb appeared before the committee, and, having been sworn, was asked this question by me:

> Senator HASTINGS. Did you know W. D. Vincent, who was president of W. D. Vincent Hardware Co., at Clay Center, Kans., on October 27, 1919?
> Mr. LAMB. Yes, sir.
> Senator HASTINGS. Do you remember writing him asking for his help in this matter?
> Mr. LAMB. Yes, sir.
> Senator HASTINGS. And did you receive in reply this letter?
> Mr. LAMB. Yes, sir.
> Senator HASTINGS. Do you know where Mr. Vincent is?
> Mr. LAMB. I think he is dead.
> Senator HASTINGS. Later, Mr. Chairman, I was going to ask that this letter be admitted in evidence.
> He says in this letter——
> (The portion of the letter read by Senator HASTINGS was later stricken out upon vote of the committee, sustaining objection by Senator CLARK.)
> Do you know anything about the experience that he had?
> Mr. LAMB. No, sir.
> Senator HASTINGS. The letter goes on——
> (The portion read by Senator HASTINGS was excluded from the record, in accordance with the previous notation.)
> What kind of a man was Vincent?
> Mr. LAMB. He was a man with a good reputation.
> Senator HASTINGS. Was he likely to write that kind of a letter unless he believed it to be true?
> Mr. LAMB. No, sir; he would not.
> The CHAIRMAN. When was that letter written, Senator?
> Senator HASTINGS. October 27, 1919.
> The CHAIRMAN. This letter was received by you?
> Mr. LAMB. Yes, sir.
> The CHAIRMAN. And Mr. Vincent is dead?
> Mr. LAMB. I understand so.

I desire also to call attention to the fact that at the time Lamb was making his report to the post-office inspector who investigated the matter, as appears on page 88 of the record, he made this statement:

> After I had returned from Washington, in October 1919 I met Dr. G. A. Crise in front of the Gillett Hotel. While we were talking Senator H. W. Avery, of Wakefield, Kans., came out of the hotel. I was introduced to Mr. Avery as the postmaster of Manhattan. After discussing matters Dr. Crise stated to Avery that "Lamb is having some trouble, however, in retaining the office."
> "Why is it?" asked Mr. Avery.
> "I understand", replied Dr. Crise, "that Lamb will not come through with $1,000."
> "Well", returned the Senator, "that has always been Helvering's post-office price. I supposed he would raise the price since the cost of living has gone up."
> After I returned from Washington I received a letter from a prominent citizen of Clay County. He wrote that he would like to see me win out as postmaster here and offered his assistance. Quoting a part of his letter, he stated:

"I know the man you have to deal with. If he aspires to political honors you may bring such pressure to bear that he will hardly dare to go back on you. Otherwise, there is only one thing that will count—money. I have not the slightest doubt that if you should promise to divide the salary the matter would be favorably settled immediately. I know by actual experience that he is that kind of a man * * *."

It will be observed by anyone reading the letter and reading that quotation from it that it is the same letter. I hold in my hand now the letter, written in pen and ink, indicating clearly that it is an old letter and was in Mr. Lamb's file and stated by him to have been received by him from Mr. Vincent.

Mr. President, it will be observed that in this letter Vincent stated that he "knew by personal experience." When Mr. Helvering came to the stand later I asked him with respect to this letter. I asked him what kind of a man Vincent was. I asked what he knew about him. He said he was a reputable business man at that place. It later was developed, by cross-examination by other Senators on the committee, that Mr. Vincent had been an applicant, while Mr. Helvering was in the Congress, for the position of postmaster at Clay Center—I believe it was at Clay Center. Mr. Helvering said the only trouble that he ever had with Vincent was the fact that he did not appoint him postmaster. I think I asked whether he could explain this letter written by Mr. Vincent and whether he could explain what Mr. Vincent meant when he said he "knew by personal experience."

It will be remembered that at this time Lamb was being approached, according to his testimony, by friends of Mr. Helvering suggesting on several occasions that he pay $1,000, and that the president of the bank later came to him and said Mr. Helvering was willing to accept a monthly amount on account of this money that he wanted paid to him.

Lamb wrote Vincent and asked Vincent with respect to it. Vincent came back and said, "I know by personal experience." It did not appear in the record what that personal experience was, but Mr. Helvering said that he fell out with Mr. Vincent, and the only reason he fell out with him was that Mr. Vincent did not get the post office. I think we might very well ask the question whether or not the personal experience that he had with him was comparable to that which Mr. Lamb was having with him, and which Mr. Lamb undertakes to specify particularly in these letters that he wrote to the Department and in the statement that he made to the post-office inspector.

Mr. President, I desire to read further from this statement. Of course I appreciate that many of these things were rumors, but I appreciate also that when this important office is under consideration and Senators are passing upon the question of whether or not this is a fit man for the office, it becomes the duty of the Senate to make a thorough investigation and find out whether there is anything in the rumors. The statement of Mr. Lamb to the post-office inspector was dated Manhattan, Kans., November 18, 1919. I desire to read just a portion of it, appearing at page 87 of the committee hearings, as follows:

After I had taken charge of the post office on April 1, 1919, ex-Congressman Guy T. Helvering called on me in my office. I asked him if Mr. Cassell had conveyed to him the word sent him. He informed me that he had not, whereupon I repeated to Helvering the message I had intended for him.

It appears in the testimony that he told Helvering the message he sent to him, saying, "If you come from Mr. Helvering you tell Mr. Helvering that I say I shall not do it and he may go to hell", or words to that effect.

He informed me that he had not, whereupon I repeated to Helvering the message I had intended for him. Shortly after this visit, Mr. Helvering was entertained at dinner at my house, 526 Houston Street, Manhattan, Kans. While there, he stated, in the presence of my wife, that he was instrumental in having my name placed at the top of the list, this being accomplished with the assistance of members of the Civil Service Board, that I was not originally at the top of the list, but was placed there through his influence. After making this statement he continued with the statement that "I always take care of my friends when they take care of me." Shortly after this, Mr. S. J. Pratt, president of the Citizens State Bank, of Manhattan, informed me that Mr. Helvering wanted a certain amount of money. My recollection is that the amount named was $1,000, although I am not absolutely sure. According to statements made to me, it was intimated that the money was to be used to pay a member of the Commission for placing me at the top of the list. I refused to pay a cent, and Mr. Helvering, according to the statement of Mr. Pratt, was told that I had no money. Mr. Pratt further reported to me that Mr. Helvering then asked that I make monthly payments. I refused to do this, but did offer to release Mr. Helvering from payment of a bill for advertising, incurred during Mr. Helvering's previous campaign. Mr. Pratt reported back that Mr. Helvering stated that he would not accept this, and added that "I am not through with him."

I want to repeat what I said yesterday, that at the time Mr. Pratt made these statements he was acting postmaster. Just previous to that time, if not at that time, he had been president of the chamber of commerce of that town of some 10,000 people. He was a director of the Rotary Club. He owned and operated a newspaper which was published semiweekly in that town, a Democratic newspaper. At the present time he is superintendent of agents of a large insurance company with offices at Manhattan, Kans. In this same statement to the post-office inspector he said:

On Sunday night, November 16, 1919, my wife and I entertained a professor of the Kansas State Agricultural College. While there he questioned me as to the probable outcome of my permanent appointment as postmaster. He stated to me that he had heard from reliable sources that J. M. Winter, ex-postmaster of Manhattan, had been paid back all money that he had paid Guy Helvering, said money being paid by Winter at various times in order that he might retain his position. The professor stated that he had heard this statement several times, and he was convinced that Winter was the victim of Helvering in securing money in this way.

On Monday, November 17, 1919, a well-known and reliable citizen stated to me that he was reliably informed that John Winter, ex-postmaster, had stated he had been repaid in money the amount received by Helvering; that this was done just before he resigned as postmaster, that Winter had stated to Helvering he would not resign until said money was returned, whereupon Helvering relinquished a certain amount previously given Helvering by Winter.

On Monday, November 17, 1919, Prof. Fred D. Merritt, of the college, met me in the Palace drug store and asked me if I knew anything new concerning my appointment. I evaded the question. He stated he was interested to the extent that he mailed "last night" a letter to the Secretary to the President of the United States, in which, among other matters, he informed the Secretary that Manhattan had had enough of inefficiency in years gone by and that he thought that the ex-postmaster (according to the rumor) had paid money to hold his position, and that it looked as if something of the sort was attempted here now, and he advised that the Department commence at Manhattan to clean out the politicians who attempted to receive money for appointments to postmasterships throughout the State.

There is in the record, and was placed there without objection, a letter from Mrs. Lena W. Brown, found at page 64 of the record of the hearings. I do not know who Mrs. Brown is. The letter is signed "Mrs. Lena W. Brown" and is dated Lawrence, Kans., March 12, 1933, and addressed to me. A part of the letter reads as follows:

The appointment of such a man as Helvering to this post is a slap at the decent citizens of this State. I voted for Mr. Woodring the first time he ran for governor, but became so disgusted with his administration that I would vote for him again for no office whatever. He was simply the tool of Mr. Helvering and his puppet, Mr. Woodring, were defeated in spite of their desperate attempts to buy the office of governor with patronage.

This appointment of Mr. Helvering would be no credit to Mr. Roosevelt in this State. It would do him a great deal of harm. I hope your committee will uncover enough of Mr. Helvering's crooked work to prevent him from taking this important office. We should have honest men in office, if such are to be found, especially at this critical time.

While you are investigating, I hope you will look up Mr. Helvering's record when he was serving as Representative in Congress from the fifth district of this State. I have been told on good authority that he sold post offices at that time—third-class post offices for $350 each, and others all the way up to $2,500, which was paid for the post office at Concordia, Kans.

I hope your committee will find out the truth about this man, and will not allow him to be whitewashed and permit him to receive this important post. We have good Democrats in this State, but this man will surely bring disgrace on the administration. His highway department, while he served under Woodring, smells to heaven and is to be investigated. If not whitwashed, and it will not be, although every effort will be made to hinder the investigation, it alone will be sufficient to cause embarrassment to Mr. Roosevelt.

I have written this especially to call your attention to the post-office deals reported to me, which I have every reason to believe are true.

Mr. President, on yesterday the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], inquiring about the time for which it would be necessary for him to address the Senate upon this subject, made this remark:

I want at least time enough to reply to this stuff being dumped into the RECORD.

I desire to call attention to some of the "stuff" that the Senator from Kentucky himself "dumped into the record", as he puts it.

On page 71 of the record before the committee, placed there by the Senator from Kentucky, will be found several letters commending Mr. Helvering. Along with them is a letter directed to "Senator BARKLEY, Chairman of the Investigating Committee on Income Tax," dated Wichita, Kans., May 11, 1933, placed there by the Senator from Kentucky. I will read the letter. I never saw it and, as a matter of fact, never read it, until this morning.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I received a number of letters from people in Kansas in favor of Mr. Helvering's confirmation. I received the letter to which the Senator refers opposing his confirmation. Contrary to the policy adopted by the Senator from Delaware himself, I put in the record what I received both for and against Mr. Helvering, whereas the Senator himself put in the record only what he heard and received against him.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does the Senator from Kentucky know that I received anything in Mr. Helvering's favor?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do not; but I assume that it would be impossible for the Senator to receive as many letters from Kansas as he seems to have received without getting at least a commendation now and then. Will the Senator say that he did not receive any?

Mr. HASTINGS. I say to the Senate that so far as my recollection goes, and I am quite certain I am correct, I did not receive a single letter from anybody commending Mr. Helvering for this position; and when I first took up this matter with the committee I distinctly stated to the committee that before I began the investigation I inquired of the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER] about this man, and he gave him a splendid reputation. I also told the committee that former Vice President Curtis had been to see me with respect to him, and had done the same thing. So far as I know, I was absolutely fair with the committee with every communication that was sent to me.

Mr. BARKLEY. Does the Senator think I acted fairly or unfairly in putting into the RECORD an unfavorable letter that I had received? And is he criticizing me for having done that?

Mr. HASTINGS: No; but this is what I am doing: I am contending that the letter written by Vincent back in 1919 is of a great deal more force, and ought to be of a great deal more weight with the Senate, than a letter written on May 11, 1933, after this particular appointment had been made. At the time the Vincent letter of 1919 was written there was no such question involved anywhere. It was a personal letter, written to a personal friend, stating what I assume and what I believe to be the facts at that time.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I am going to yield this time; but in view of the fact that our time is limited, I am not going to yield further than this one time.

Mr. CLARK. Of course, the Senator will have had three times as much time as anybody else by the time he finishes, counting the 2 hours he has already taken. If the Senator does not want to yield, I will answer him in my own time. I simply want to correct a mistake in the record; that is all.

Mr. HASTINGS. All right. Does the Senator want to correct it?

Mr. CLARK. If the Senator is willing to yield, I will.

Mr. HASTINGS. I stated that I was perfectly willing to yield this one time; but I called attention to the fact that my time was limited, and that I did not want to yield further.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator said a moment ago that the letter from Vincent to Lamb was a letter from one personal friend to another. As a matter of fact, Mr. Lamb testified on the witness stand on cross-examination that he had a very slight acquaintance with Mr. Vincent, and admitted that after he discovered that Mr. Helvering was not to recommend his reappointment he entered into correspondence with all the soreheads he could hear of all over Kansas who were mad at Mr. Helvering for not giving him the appointment. So it was not a question of correspondence between two personal friends; but Mr. Lamb's testimony shows that it was a correspondence between a couple of soreheads, trying to build up a case.

Mr. HASTINGS. This letter is as follows:

WICHITA, KANS., May 11, 1933.

Senator BARKLEY,
Chairman of Investigating Committee on Income Tax.

Reference: To Guy Helvering, that was nominated by the President as income-tax collector and his nomination was held up by the investigating committee of the Senate.

Now, Mr. BARKLEY, this letter is being written by C. B. McVicker, of Wichita, Sedgwick County, Kans. First, I have five reasons why I am writing this letter to you. If you care to, you can show this letter to Congressman AYRES or Senator GEORGE MCGILL. I am personally acquainted with both of them. Reasons are as follows:

First. I can furnish you three or four hundred employees that were under Guy Helvering here in Kansas, from the Hutchinson Reformatory down to the man that shovels gravel and the sand haulers that hauled the sand and the stenographers that made out their time, were all forced to pay to Guy Helvering from 5 to 12½ percent of their weekly and monthly salaries. This I can prove by men that were working on this work.

Second. He put the State of Kansas in the hole $3,000,000. Where did the money go to? Who can answer that question? Nobody but Guy Helvering. If he was running for an office like Governor Woodring for reelection, he would not get away from the quarter pole. It was Guy Helvering that defeated Woodring for governor the second time. Now, Mr. BARKLEY, if you can show me where we have not got the best man in the Presidential chair that has ever been put in office, then I will say put one of the biggest robbers and crooks, put him in the chair, Guy T. Helvering.

Third. It was very unfortunate that Helvering was Woodring's manager. The people of Sedgwick County and 103 other counties in the State of Kansas would have supported Woodring, but they claim to vote for Woodring would be to maintain Helvering in the office. Therefore he was defeated by a Republican candidate, Alf. L. Landon, who is Governor of the State of Kansas. A thing that is very unusual, to have a Republican governor in a Democratic State.

Fourth. I want you to take time and read this through and you can show this to GEORGE MCGILL or W. A. AYRES, whom I have known for years. I am an old painter and decorator; was here in Wichita for years and years. I am 74 years of age and past, and I am not asking any alms and I have no income tax to pay, but I have friends that do have, and to h——l with Helvering. We do not want him in the office. What did he do at El Dorado in the oil business? What did he do here in Wichita in the oil game? What would he do if he ever got in again? I say, keep him out.

Fifth. I, C. B. McVicker, of Wichita, Sedgwick County, State of Kansas, can furnish you with several hundred of affidavits to truth and veracity in regard to the assertions of the foregoing letter that is enclosed. There is no reason, in my mind, why he should ever be appointed to any office by the President of the United States or anyone else, as far as that goes. I don't think he is eligible for a dog catcher, for he would catch your dog, then come around, turn him loose to you for a dollar and go away, then come back and catch him the second time, and charge another dollar or two to get your dog back.

I sincerely believe that his past history and crookedness in the office that he held here in Kansas, of which he put the State of Kansas over $3,000,000 in the red, ought to be sufficient evidence to keep the President or the Senate from O.K.ing this nomination. We have plenty of good, honest men in Sedgwick County, and plenty of them in the State of Kansas, who are fully qualified to handle the income-tax problems far better than this man Helvering, and it is a cinch that they are honest in their dealings. I am not in any way alarmed if you would want to publish this foregoing letter. Shoot. For I, C. B. McVicker, am a Scotch-Irishman and thoroughbred Democrat and a square shooter.

Thanking you for taking up so much of your valuable time in reading this letter, I am satisfied at these few lines; they might be more, but if I had the money to pay expenses with, I would get you three or four hundred names of former employees under Guy Helvering, that they had to come across with their cuts or donations to what he called a campaign fund or lose the job. Lots of them quit.

Would like to hear from you and see what you think of this letter. You can ask my two friends what they think of me—Congressman AYRES and Senator MCGILL; you know them both. I will now close by thanking you for your patience in reading this letter—if you are lucky enough to get it, which I see no reason why you shouldn't. Address all communications to 350 Riverview.

C. B. MCVICKER.

I call attention to the fact that that letter was placed in the RECORD by the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. President, it appears from the testimony, upon cross-examination, that Mr. Helvering was the chairman of the Democratic State committee of the State of Kansas, and that as chairman of the Democratic State committee he undertook to collect funds for the Democratic Party from the employees of the State. His attention was called to some charge that he collected and assessed as much as 5 percent. He positively denied that the amount assessed was 5 percent, and said there was no assessment at all; that it was a contribution that was requested, and he said it was 2½ percent. It turned out, however, upon cross-examination, that the 5 percent did apply to each particular year in which there was a campaign, which made 2½ percent for each year, they paying every 2 years.

There is in the record the fact that these statements were sent, as I recollect, to the School for the Blind, and that partially blind persons employed in the blind shop received such letters. Mr. Helvering excused himself in that matter by saying that that was done by the persons who had charge of that particular employment; but a very significant fact in this record is that Mr. Helvering himself was the head of the commission of the highway department, which employed as many as 1,500 persons. The point was made that they were not all Democrats. Mr. Helvering stated that 35 percent of them were Republicans, and he stated in his testimony that a request for funds went to all persons in his department, regardless of whether they were Democrats or whether they were Republicans; and we get the distinct impression that the Republicans responded quite as promptly as did the Democrats.

Mr. President, there may be different views upon this question of collecting money from employees of the State or of the Nation. People have different ideas with respect to it. It is contended by many that it is no harm for a person enjoying the position that Mr. Helvering did—namely, chairman of the State committee—to request of his own party employees holding political office that they contribute to a fund to take care of the campaign of that particular party. There is no particular complaint of that procedure from my point of view; but I say that this situation is quite different from that, in that this particular chairman of the Democratic State Committee of the State of Kansas was also the head of the road commission, employing 1,500 and more persons, 35 percent of whom were Republicans. What is a Republican going to do under circumstances like that, when he is requested by the head of the commission to contribute to the Democratic fund?

The sole claim that is made against this practice is that when it is done, it results in putting fear into the mind of the employee, and therefore that his contribution is not a voluntary contribution. If it can be shown that it is a voluntary contribution, there is no particular harm in it from my point of view; but when that cannot be shown, and when a man knows that the request he makes is bound to have an influence upon the employee that will compel him to contribute in a way that is not voluntary, then I say that the man who does that is quite too practical a politician to warrant his being placed in a position like this.

He was asked the question, "What effect did this have upon the employee?" and his reply was that he did not know what his mental reaction was to that request.

Mr. President, in addition to that, the charge is made here that he collected these funds and accounted to nobody, notwithstanding the law of the State of Kansas says that he must. True, he denied that; he said that he did account, that the account was audited, and that the whole thing was straightened out in a perfectly satisfactory way. We have no evidence of that except his own statement with respect to it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BAILEY in the chair). Does the Senator from Delaware yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Either the Senator's recollection is faulty or he did not pay any attention to the matter. The chairman of the State Democratic committee and members of the State Democratic committee sent communications here, which were put into the record, showing that this whole matter was thrashed out before the committee, that Mr. Helvering was sustained unanimously, that an audit was made by the auditor of the State, or the State accountant, whichever it is, and that was put into the record, showing exactly how much money was collected and how much was expended; and there is no dispute about that fact.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will not the Senator give me the page of the record? I apologize to the Senate with respect to what I have said. I have not seen that in the record and I do not remember that it was put into the record. It may have been put in, but I certainly did not see it; and if it is in the record, I think it would be well for the Senator to point it out in his own time.

Mr. President, there were two or three things I overlooked yesterday in discussing other phases of this question. In the first place, I want to call attention to the fact that the revenue agent in charge in Kansas at this very time, at the time Washington, Henry & Co. were performing there and at the time these cases were being sent to Mr. Helvering, was Mr. Helvering's cousin. That is admitted by Mr. Helvering himself.

In the report is a statement by the agents making the examination showing that a former partner of Washington, Henry & Co., stated that he left the company and went into business for himself, and he approached this revenue agent in charge in Kansas, the cousin of Mr. Helvering, and that agent advised him to get in touch with Mr. Helvering with respect to this matter. That will be found on page 9 of the record.

Mr. Gus V. Winston made this statement:

On or about August 29, 1918, I entered into a partnership agreement with Harry M. Washington to engage in business as auditors and income-tax specialists, and I financed the establishment of our Wichita (Kans.) office, which was conducted under the name of H. M. Washington & Co. I severed my connection as a member of the firm in June 1919. From the beginning of my association with Harry Washington he told me that he had a friend in Congress who understood the tax business and who could get information before anyone else could. He did not mention the name of the Congressman at that time, but from subsequent developments, particularly the retention of the services in Washington, D.C., of Guy Helvering, whose term in Congress expired March 4, 1919, I reached the conclusion that Helvering was the man to whom he referred. I do not know the financial arrangement which existed between Harry Washington and Guy Helvering.

Further along in his statement to the inspector he said:

Following an examination of the Oil & Gas Co. of Eldorado, Kans., made by Revenue Agent W. A. Seigal, in November 1920, as the result of which additional tax of $211,000 was set up, the company gave me the case to try to effect an adjustment. I went to see Bert Halvern, the revenue agent in charge at Wichita—who, after I had shown him the records, admitted that the report was wrong, but stated that it was too late for him to do anything as all the papers had been sent to Washington, D.C. He said when I got to Washington, D.C., I should see Guy Helvering, who he said would be glad to take the case, and he even wrote to Helvering, without any suggestion on my part, and told him about the case, and that I would probably be in Washington to see him. Bert Halvern told me later that he had received a reply from Guy Helvering to the effect that he would be glad to help me out. When I went to Washington, D.C., I took the case up with the department myself and did not go to Helvering because I knew he would want a percentage for securing abatement of the $211,000 additional tax, whereas the Oil & Gas Co. is not only unable to pay anything additional but feels that it is entitled to a refund of part of the tax already paid for 1917.

That was the Representative's cousin—

In that same connection the records show that this revenue agent in charge when this investigation was complete was demoted to a field position.

I desire also to call attention to a statement made by Edgecomb in his statement to the inspectors, which appears on page 8. It is true that when he was on the stand, and I read him this, he could not recall having made it, but the statement was made shortly after the event, and, as Edgecomb states, his recollection would have been very much better then than it is at the present time. He made this statement, talking about the Trapshooters Oil Co. case:

Immediately following the hearing held before Mr. Powell in the Commissioner's office in Washington, D.C., some time in April 1920, and while I was walking along the streets of Washington, D.C., in company with Harry Washington, I stated to him that he shouldn't take me for a fool; that I realized there was something crooked about the demands made on me for $10,000 and other amounts by him and Mr. Guy Helvering, and that he might as well tell me the whole truth about their scheme instead of trying to hoodwink me. To this Mr. Washington only answered, "Forget it; I don't care what you think of me personally, the matter is all settled now", or words to that effect.

I desire also to call attention to the fact that nowhere in the records in these cases will one be able to find the name of Mr. Helvering mentioned as counsel. No power of attorney has been filed; and his name is not mentioned, so far as I have been able to find, in any of these records.

One matter which I intended to call to the attention of the Senate appears in the report of the inspector on page 183, in which he makes this statement:

5. Deputy Collector H. W. Washington, in his report, July 21, 1917, attached, states as follows:

Now, be it remembered that Washington was the same man who appeared later with Helvering in the Slim Jim Oil Co. case, and succeeded in having the tax reduced to $459,000; but when Washington was deputy collector, on July 21, 1917, with respect to the Slim Jim Oil Co. case he had this to say:

On March 21, 1917, the company (Slim Jim) sold its undivided one half interest for $1,750,000. After reviewing all these transactions and book entries with the officers of the Slim Jim Oil & Gas Co. it is quite evident to us that this company now proposes to include these amounts as income for the year 1916, in an effort to evade the increase in the rate of income tax, as well as the excess-profits tax, which it will quite likely have to pay if the profit is properly returned in the year 1917.

In connection with the collection of campaign funds, I intended to quote from a statement made by Representative McGUGIN, who appeared before the committee and left with the committee a letter signed by the four Republican Members of Congress from Kansas, recommending the confirmation of Mr. Helvering. He was asked this question by Senator BARKLEY:

Senator BARKLEY. With reference to these campaign collections from employees, what has been the custom in Kansas with reference to that?

Mr. McGUGIN. I would say it has been more or less the custom of both parties to collect these funds. I rather think, under the leadership of Mr. Helvering, it was handled more efficiently and more effectively and more practically than probably it had ever been done before. It is a policy that should be stopped by both parties, no doubt, and probably will.

I think, Mr. President, I have pretty thoroughly covered this record, and I have no more to say upon the subject for the moment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes to the senior Senator from Kansas [Mr. CAPPER].

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I rise to speak briefly in support of the confirmation of Mr. Helvering for this important appointment. Personally and politically I would prefer to have a Republican for Commissioner of Internal Revenue. Mr. Helvering is a Democrat, from my home State of Kansas. I have known him and known of him for 25 or 30 years. We have been always of opposite political faiths. Mr. Helvering has always supported my opponent in every campaign in which I have been before the voters as a candidate. He has not solicited my support in this case. I have no interest in the matter other than to see a citizen of my State receive fair treatment. I have examined carefully all the testimony taken by the Finance Committee, and find nothing to justify me in voting against Mr. Helvering's confirmation.

Mr. President, since we cannot have a Republican nominated for this office—and I believe it is quite evident that we cannot—I am glad to say to my colleagues in the Senate that the nominee is a high-class citizen, well known and respected in Kansas, and worthy of support. He is a high-class business man, whose business and personal integrity is not questioned in his home State. I believe him to be honest and well qualified to fill the position to which he has been appointed. He has been the center of several vigorously contested political campaigns, but that does not, in my judgment, disqualify him from holding office under a Democratic administration. If I opposed his confirmation, it would be for political reasons, and I will not permit purely partisan considerations to determine my decision in such a matter as this. Let me say also that my position is no reflection on any Senator who considers it his duty to oppose confirmation of Mr. Helvering.

I do not intend to make any extended speech; I just want to assure the Senate that, as a fellow Kansan, I intend to vote for Mr. Helvering's confirmation, and know of no reason other than partisan reasons why any Senator should not do likewise.

The Senator from Delaware made reference to a statement filed with the Committee on Finance by the four Republican Representatives from the State of Kansas, which was made voluntarily, and I am glad to join with them in the statement made as to Mr. Helvering. The statement was dated May 15, 1933; was addressed to Hon. ALBEN W. BARKLEY, chairman of the subcommittee of the Committee on Finance, and is as follows:

MAY 15, 1933.

RE: CONFIRMATION OF GUY T. HELVERING, AS COMMISSIONER OF INTERNAL REVENUE

Hon. ALBEN W. BARKLEY,
Chairman Subcommittee, Committee on Finance,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR BARKLEY: We, the undersigned four Republican Members of Congress from Kansas, have no interest in Democratic appointees to office. As Members of the House of Representatives, we have no desire in any way to intrude upon the prerogatives of the Senate in the matter of confirmations.

As Representatives of the State of Kansas, we are interested in doing what we can to see to it that no citizen of Kansas, irrespective of politics, is unfairly and unjustifiably assailed as to character and ability.

We regard Hon. Guy T. Helvering as a man of high character and exceptional ability. He has been our political foe, but where personal character is concerned, we feel that party consideration should be cast aside.

Very truly yours,

U. S. GUYER.
CLIFFORD R. HOPE.
W. P. LAMBERTSON.
HAROLD McGUGIN.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I yield 15 minutes to the junior Senator from Kansas [Mr. McGILL].

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, I desire to thank my friend, the Senator from Kentucky, for yielding to me a few moments of the time. I have not been able during the period since the hearings were held before the Finance Committee to go over those hearings carefully or to study the testimony in detail, but, insofar as I have been able to ascertain from those hearings, anything detrimental to the confirmation of Mr. Helvering is based wholly and solely upon the purest kind of hearsay testimony—testimony that would not be received or accepted for any purpose in any court in this country.

Mr. President, I only desire to say a few words in behalf of the nominee. Mr. Helvering is a graduate in law from the law school of Ann Arbor. From reading the views of the minority, filed by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], it would appear that the question of Mr. Helvering's competency to fill the position to which the President has nominated him is the chief one in issue. Therefore, I direct the attention of the Senate to the educational qualifications of this man. At the time he was a young man, after graduation from the law school he went to the city of Marysville, in the State of Kansas, and was soon thereafter elected to the position of county attorney of his county. My recollection is—and I think the record discloses—that he was elected twice by the people of that county to serve as their prosecuting attorney.

In 1912 the Fifth Congressional District of Kansas first honored him by electing him as their Representative in the Congress of the United States. He was reelected in 1914 and again reelected in 1916. It is a rather unusual thing, notwithstanding the statement of my good friend from Wichita, Mr. McVicker, for a man to be elected as a Democrat three times from a congressional district in Kansas.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kansas yield to me?

Mr. McGILL. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas if he heard the statement of one of the star witnesses, relied on by the Senator from Delaware, to the effect that one of the phenomena in the recent election was the election of a Republican governor of Kansas. I should like to ask the Senator from Kansas if, in his experience, it has been any unusual thing to have a Republican governor elected in the State of Kansas, as indicated by the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, in response to the question of the Senator from Missouri, I will state that the history of Kansas discloses no man elected on the Democratic ticket as Governor of Kansas has ever been reelected. So I think Kansas can hardly be designated as having been a Democratic State. However, I feel that it is now, and I hope it will continue to be.

Mr. Helvering, after having served 6 years in the House of Representatives of the National Congress, established a bank, or became the president of a bank, in the city of Salina, Kans. Salina is about the fourth or fifth city in population in the State. After living in Salina for a period of only a few years, Mr. Helvering was elected mayor of that city, and served either 1 or 2 terms as the mayor of the city of Salina. I feel that the commendation of the people of the county in which he first resided, the commendation of the people of the congressional district in which he resided, and the commendation of the people of the city in which he now makes his home is one of the best of recommendations and overthrows the weight of any testimony coming here in the form of communications from those who have seen fit to write to the members of the Committee on Finance of this body.

Mr. President, something has been said with reference to the collection of campaign funds by Mr. Helvering as chairman of the Democratic State central committee during the last two campaigns in that State. I do not personally know anything with reference to that matter. The committee handling my campaign was a different and a distinct committee. However, the testimony adduced before the committee discloses the fact to be that the course pursued has been a practice of both the major political parties in that State. I assume also it has been a practice indulged in by State committees in many other States of the Union. I doubt not that there are Senators here who can confirm this conclusion.

However, whatever may be said with reference to that matter, whether we put our stamp of approval on it here or whether we do not, or whether individual Members of this body do or do not, permit me to suggest that the State chairman of the Republican State committee in the administration preceding that of Governor Woodring was appointed by the then Governor as the highway director of the State, and it is admitted by the testimony of the Republican Members of the delegation from Kansas in the House of Representatives that the same practice was indulged in by that and other Republican State administrations. The then State chairman, if you please, Mr. President, is the present Governor of the State of Kansas.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McGILL. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. As I understand, then, the Republican State chairman under the Republican Governor who preceded Governor Woodring, while State chairman, was appointed director of highways?

Mr. McGILL. Director or commissioner of highways—I do not recall the exact title of the office.

Mr. BARKLEY. And, while being Republican State chairman and also director of highways, that he collected campaign funds from appointees of the Republican administration?

Mr. McGILL. What I mean to say is that he was the chairman of the Republican State committee and the testimony before the Senate Finance Committee discloses the fact to be that the Republican State committee indulged in the same practice as was indulged in by the Democratic committee under the administration of Governor Woodring.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McGILL. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to ask the Senator if he thinks it would be possible to get letters from any disgruntled Republican office seekers in Kansas to the effect that the present Governor is no good because he did not give them appointments to office?

Mr. McGILL. I do not like to pass upon what might be anticipated from members of the opposition party. However, let me direct attention to this in support of what my colleague [Mr. CAPPER] has had to say in certifying to the character of the nominee. A distinguished American, one, I feel, who is known either by reputation or personally to practically every Member of this body, sent a telegram to the chairman of the Finance Committee. This Kansan is a nationally known writer; he is the editor of one of the large daily newspapers of my State. He is not my political ally, and I do not think he has ever been, but, notwithstanding that fact, I regard him to be a man of high character and a good citizen. I refer to the Honorable William Allen White. Here is the telegram, published in the report of the Finance Committee, sent by Mr. White relative to Mr. Helvering. He says:

> Speaking as a Kansan of the opposite political faith, I should like to attest the sound business judgment, brains, and high standing as a citizen of Guy T. Helvering.

This communication, the testimony of Republican Members of the House coming from the State of Kansas, and the statement of my colleague at least ought to carry such weight as to overthrow the conclusions reached by the minority of the Finance Committee to the effect that Mr. Helvering is not qualified to fill the office to which the President has seen fit to nominate him.

Mr. President, something has been said in the course of the remarks made by the distinguished Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] relative to an investigation conducted relative to the practices of Mr. Helvering and the firm of Washington, Henry & Co. and others before the Bureau of Internal Revenue here in Washington. I do not intend and I have no desire to take the time of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, a member of the committee, in discussing in detail the facts relative to the oil concern to which reference has been made, but I do find a significant statement in the conclusion of the report of the special investigator. It would seem, Mr. President, that this investigation was largely brought to pass by virtue of certain articles appearing in a newspaper in the State of Kansas edited by a distinguished Republican, former Governor of the State of Kansas and a former Member of this body. This is what this special investigator had to say at the conclusion of his report:

> We were of the opinion that a thorough reexamination of tax cases enumerated in our previous report would disclose practices on the part of Helvering which would warrant his disbarment, at least, and possibly criminal prosecution.

That was the opinion entertained by the special investigator at the time he began the investigation. Let us see what his conclusions are:

> However, we have been advised today by Deputy Commissioner Batson that an examination of several of these cases has been made in the Bureau by men selected because of their technical knowledge of the matters to which the cases relate and that they have reported to him that the adjustments appear to have been made in accordance with the law and regulations. Therefore, there would seem to be no occasion to make the field examination which we suggested.

In other words, the conclusion reached was that the cases handled by Mr. Helvering had been handled according to the law and according to the regulations of the Department of the Treasury.

Mr. President, there is other testimony here which has been called to the attention of the Senate in the questions propounded by the distinguished Senator from Kentucky and the distinguished Senator from Missouri relative to the employment of a firm of attorneys here, one being the brother-in-law of a former distinguished Vice President and the other the Republican national committeeman from the District of Columbia. The testimony of the Republican national committeeman from the District of Columbia, who was later employed in the Slim Jim Oil Co. case, was to the effect that the record in said case disclosed no fraud committed or engaged in by Mr. Helvering.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. McGILL. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it not true that he not only said there was no fraud, but that there was no contention of fraud by the Government in the case at all?

Mr. McGILL. That is my recollection.

Mr. CONNALLY. There was no contention by anybody connected with the Bureau of Internal Revenue in the reinvestigation of the case that raised any issue of fraud or charged any fraud?

Mr. McGILL. That is my recollection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes more to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, another matter was mentioned here this morning with reference to the post office at Concordia, Kans., in which some lady by the name of Brown, from Lawrence, Kans., has written the distinguished Senator from Delaware indicating that the postmastership had been sold by Mr. Helvering while he was a Member of the House of Representatives. The postmaster was Mr. A. B. Karney. He appeared before the Finance Committee and disputed any such contention. Mr. A. B. Karney is a man with whom I am well acquainted. He was formerly a member of the State Senate of Kansas and is now a resident of Wichita, Kans.

All the testimony I have been able to read relevant to any alleged irregularities concerning postmasterships has been refuted. Nothing has been brought home to the nominee, Mr. Helvering. I do not care to transgress upon the time of the members of the committee who desire to address the Senate on the question, and I therefore submit, in the light of the record, the nomination of Mr. Helvering should be confirmed by this body.

Mr. McGILL subsequently said: Mr. President, I find that in the remarks submitted by me a while ago I made an erroneous statement, which I desire to correct. I made a statement to the effect that the present Governor of Kansas was, under the administration of former Governor Reed of that State, highway director. That was my impression at the time. I find, however, I was in error in that statement, and I desire to correct it at this time.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK].

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, there are a few matters in the record which I think should be pointed out to the Senate. We are all familiar with the language of the old hymn we used to hear when we were boys—

> While the lamp holds out to burn
> The vilest sinner may return.

Therefore it has been a matter of very great interest to every Member of the Senate, to see the distinguished Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], who has defended every infamy of the Mellon regime in the Treasury, who was one of those who were active in putting the notorious Bob Lucas into the commissionership of Internal Revenue, maintaining him there just long enough to enable him to read the income-tax returns of the large taxpayers and then taking him out of the Bureau of Internal Revenue and associating him with the unspeakable Joe Grundy for the purpose of "frying fat" for the Republican National Committee, now so anxious as to the character of Treasury officials. In the light of those facts it is very interesting, indeed, to see the tender solicitude exhibited by the distinguished Senator from Delaware for the standards to be maintained in the Bureau of Internal Revenue.

Mr. President, I invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that upon the Finance Committee are 6 members, 6 Senators, who, over a period of many years, have been closely associated and acquainted with Mr. Helvering, the nominee in this case. The chairman of the Finance Committee, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN], and the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], were all Members of the House and served as colleagues of Mr. Helvering during the 6 years of his membership in that body. The junior Senator from California [Mr. McADOO] was Secretary of the Treasury during the period in which Mr. Helvering was a member of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, during the great period of war financing, and came into the closest possible contact with him. I was Parliamentarian of the House throughout the first 4 years of Mr. Helvering's service in that body. I invite the attention of the Senate to the fact that every Senator and everyone else who has personal knowledge of Mr. Helvering and had an opportunity of being personally acquainted with him is strong in his support for this high office.

I invite further attention to the fact that the distinguished Presiding Officer of this body, the Vice President of the United States, served in the House with Mr. Helvering and served upon the Ways and Means Committee with him; that his voice, so far as he is able to express it in this body, is in behalf of the confirmation of Mr. Helvering.

I invite attention to the fact also that the two able and distinguished Senators from the State of Kansas [Mr. CAPPER and Mr. McGILL], one of them a Republican and the other a Democrat, have given testimony as to Mr. Helvering's fitness for the position; that the distinguished and beloved former Vice President of the United States, Mr. Curtis, has borne witness to the high standing of Mr. Helvering; that the four Republican Members of the House of Representatives from Kansas, with an opportunity to know Mr. Helvering, have taken the trouble to do the unusual thing of appearing before the Finance Committee to bear testimony to Mr. Helvering's fitness for the position.

I invite attention to the fact that two eminent publicists, to mention only two among the many in the State of Kansas, both ardent Republicans, William Allen White and Victor Murdock, have declared openly in favor of the confirmation of the nomination of Mr. Helvering.

Every man except a few soreheaded, disappointed office seekers who have been here in this connection, every man who has had an opportunity of knowing Mr. Helvering, has appeared in support of his nomination, and it has remained only for the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], the distinguished former judge of the police court in Wilmington, Del., to enter upon an excursion into the sewers underneath the factionalism in the State of Kansas to undertake to find some filth to throw upon this nominee.

I am not going to undertake to review the record in this case. That will be done by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY], who was chairman of the subcommittee of the Finance Committee that heard the evidence, but I do want to call attention to the kind of testimony upon which the Senator from Delaware relies here to make a case.

His star witness, brought at the expense of the Government from away out in Kansas for the purpose of discrediting Mr. Helvering, was a man named Lamb, a disappointed applicant for the post office, rancorous against Helvering because Mr. Helvering did not recommend that his temporary appointment be made permanent.

Mr. Lamb was brought here at Government expense, at the instance of the Senator from Delaware, for the purpose of trying to discredit the nominee in this case. He went upon the witness stand and testified to a state of facts that no reasonable man could possibly believe. He testified that four times he had been approached by a man named Cassell, who had solicited at his hands a contribution of $1,000 in consideration of being appointed postmaster; that he had told Cassell to go and tell Mr. Helvering to "go to hell"; that he had nothing to do with him and did not want anything to do with him. He testified further that thereafter Mr. Helvering came to see him at the post office and that he asked Helvering out of a clear sky whether Cassell had delivered the message that Lamb had sent to Helvering; that Helvering replied that he had not, and Lamb thereupon repeated to Helvering that he had sent him word by Cassell to "go to hell."

At that point in the examination he was asked what Mr. Helvering said in response and he said that he could not remember that Helvering had said anything.

He then testified that shortly thereafter he invited Helvering to his own home to dinner; that at the dinner table, out of a clear sky, without anything having been said to justify the remark, apropos of nothing at all, Helvering suddenly informed him that he, Helvering, had had him moved from the bottom of the eligible list to the top of the eligible list; that Helvering claimed to have some sort of control over the Civil Service Commission; and that Helvering then made the significant remark, "I always take care of my friends when they take care of me." When Mr. Lamb was asked what he said in response to this remark of Helvering or what his wife said in response to it or what Helvering said further during the course of that meal, he was unable to remember anything.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

Mr. CLARK. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. Does this man who claims he told Helvering to "go to hell" then invite him to his home to have dinner with him?

Mr. CLARK. I am coming to that in just a moment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Perhaps that is what he meant by "go to hell"—to go to dinner with him. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARK. In Mr. Lamb's first appearance before the committee he left the very distinct impression that his conversations with Mr. Cassell, in which Cassell had undertaken to shake him down for a thousand dollars on behalf of Helvering, were after he had received the recess appointment and was already in office and when the matter of his permanent appointment was pending. But following Mr. Lamb upon the witness stand Mr. Cassell, the man with whom he claimed to have had these conversations, was called to testify and he made as frank and outspoken and candid a witness as I have ever seen on the witness stand in all my experience as a lawyer.

Mr. Cassell not only denied specifically and categorically the story which Mr. Lamb had told, but he also went into a circumstantial account that at the time of Mr. Lamb's appointment as postmaster he, Cassell, had not spoken to Lamb for more than 8 months. The Senator from Delaware, acting as prosecuting attorney, was not satisfied to leave the record in that shape and he recalled Mr. Lamb and then it was disclosed for the first time that these four conversations which Lamb claimed to have had with Cassell were before Lamb's appointment as temporary postmaster. In other words, Mr. Lamb's testimony—and we took him over the whole matter two or three times—stands in this shape, that he asked the Senate of the United States and the country to believe that four times in the month before his appointment as temporary postmaster, this man Cassell came to him trying to shake him down for a thousand dollars as a condition for Helvering's recommendation of his appointment; that on each occasion Mr. Lamb responded to Mr. Cassell that Mr. Helvering could "go to hell"; that he did not want anything to do with him; that thereafter Mr. Helvering actually recommended him and had him appointed, and Mr. Lamb does not contend he was not appointed temporary postmaster upon the recommendation of Mr. Helvering.

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CLARK. I am glad to yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. McGILL. Does not the record disclose that Mr. Lamb served a full 4-year term as postmaster?

Mr. CLARK. That is perfectly true; but Mr. Lamb would ask us to believe that, after having been interviewed four times by an agent of Mr. Helvering, who tried to shake him down and who told him he would not be appointed postmaster unless he came through with a thousand dollars, on each occasion responded that Mr. Helvering could "go to hell", and Mr. Helvering actually did appoint him thereafter. He would have the Senate further believe that the first time Mr. Helvering came to Manhattan he came into the post office and out of a clear sky he—Lamb—said, "Did you receive my message that I told Cassell to tell you you could 'go to hell?'" Whereupon Helvering stood mute, according to Lamb. Having received this insulting ultimatum, Lamb would have us believe that Helvering stood there mute and thereafter had no conversation on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Missouri has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I yield 10 minutes more to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. Thereafter, without any further conversation on the subject, Lamb invited Helvering to his house, where apparently amicable relations were resumed; until right out of a clear sky, in the presence of Lamb's wife at the dinner table, Helvering made this preposterous remark to the effect that he "always took care of his friends when they took care of him"; but at that point the conversation was dropped, and nothing further was ever said about the matter.

I say to the Members of the Senate that if they will read the record they will find that the star witness of the Senator from Delaware testified to such a preposterous statement that he is not entitled to the credence of any reasonable man.

Then they brought in another man, out on parole from the Kansas penitentiary for embezzlement, who testified that Helvering told him to go and get a thousand dollars from somebody. It is upon witnesses of that sort, it is upon testimony of that sort, it is upon letters written by members of the group in Kansas headed by the goat-gland specialist, Dr. Brinkley, it is upon the testimony of letters of men who have been dead for 15 years, who were unsworn, to the effect that they knew Helvering to be a rascal—a fact that they discovered after they themselves were not appointed postmasters—that the Senator from Delaware relies to make his case.

I say that the proceedings in this case, the character of the testimony here adduced, and the inclusion in the record by the Senator from Delaware of a letter which had been ruled out by the unanimous vote of every member of the Finance Committee except himself, constitute a highly discreditable performance.

One thing I forgot to recount of the testimony of Mr. Lamb is the fact that according to Mr. Lamb's own statement, while he was not willing to give $1,000 to be appointed postmaster, so he says, he was perfectly willing to give Helvering a bill that he claimed Helvering owed him. Just what the difference is between a man who admits that he is willing to forgive a small bill and one who is willing to pay a larger sum, what standing he has as a witness, I will leave to the Senator from Delaware to explain. I repeat that the conduct of this matter has been highly discreditable.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I suppose I have the right to conclude this argument; and if there are any other speeches against this man's confirmation I should like to have them made now, so that I can answer them all at once.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I do not know who has charge of the time, but I should like to speak in opposition to the confirmation.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Delaware has charge of the time on the other side.

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield to the Senator from Michigan whatever time he desires.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I did not expect to say anything about this case, because the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] has had more contact with the witnesses and has gone more thoroughly into the testimony than I have; but the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] yesterday took occasion to bring politics into the question. I want to say, so far as I am concerned, that at no time have I engaged in any political controversies in the Senate or had any concern about political appointments.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. COUZENS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to say that I entirely acquit the Senator from Michigan of any such conduct or intention.

Mr. COUZENS. I thank the Senator.

For many long years I have had experience in employing men and engaging men for responsible positions and have not made many errors; but I want to say, in all fairness, that even the confirmation of Mr. Helvering, which is going to take place, is not going to end this controversy. My good friends on the other side of the Chamber can railroad this confirmation through. They have done it in the past, and they are going to continue to railroad confirmations through; but such a course is not going to command public confidence.

If there ever was a time in the history of the Nation when the public should have confidence in their Government, confidence in their public officials, confidence in their integrity and their honesty, it is now. The mere votes of a few Senators on one side or the other, and especially in confirmation of men like this nominee, are not going to settle the issue. If Senators over on the other side do have four or five or a dozen majority to confirm this nominee, I hope they do not think that settles the issue so far as the country is concerned. It is wholly immaterial to me how Senators on the other side vote. They have their own problems to settle; but I want to say to them, in all good faith, that the matter will not be settled after they have confirmed this man.

Mr. President, in my judgment, this man has a disreputable record in his associations with the Bureau of Internal Revenue, the very Bureau of which it is proposed to put him in charge. From my contact with him on the several occasions when he appeared before the Finance Committee, he was shifty, and there was not at any time a doubt in my mind that he had confederates in the Bureau of Internal Revenue.

Mr. President, whether any of these details are proved as to whether Mr. Helvering asked money for post-office appointments, or whether he was a politician, or what he did in his position as commissioner of roads of Kansas, in my opinion, is not material, except so far as those things tend to confirm the type of man he is. Entirely outside of that, however, there is not any doubt in my mind that he had confederates in the Bureau of Internal Revenue, and there is not any doubt in my mind that if his confirmation takes place, and he is sworn in, he will have confederates outside of the Treasury Department.

Mr. President, all we have to consider is the kind of a frame-up that took place in the Slim Jim Oil Co. case, where it was perfectly apparent that Mr. Helvering had confederates inside the Bureau who sent out an assessment for one hundred and fifty-odd thousand dollars, and then had the matter fixed up on the outside so that it would be settled for $7,000.

You lawyers can argue details, and you can discuss words, and you can quibble about whether or not this is competent evidence on which to send a man to jail. That is not the question that controls me. I am not interested in whether this is good or bad evidence from a criminal standpoint. We are not sending this man to jail. We are not going to convict him of being a criminal. We are just going to say whether we, in our judgment, think he is a fit man to administer billions of dollars of revenue that we collect from the taxpayers of the United States. To quibble about mere details, and whether this is good or bad evidence, in my judgment is entirely wide of the issue.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. Just for a question. I should like to have an explanation from the Senator as to the discrepancy between the $125,000 and the $7,000 settlement. The Senator has it in his mind and has given thought to it.

Mr. COUZENS. I heard that particular part of the testimony. The Senator from Nevada has the figures a little wrong. I have not read the testimony for some days, and I have not it here, because I am not going to go into the details of the testimony. The Senator from Delaware has done that. I am telling you my convictions and observations from contact with the man and hearing part of the testimony. Frankly, I did not hear it all. I reached the full and definite conclusion after seeing him, seeing his shifty eyes and his shifty methods when responding to questions and testifying before the committee, that he was not a fit man for that office; and I reached the conclusion that no matter what kind of testimony he gave, whether it was legally sufficient to convict him of a crime or otherwise, it would not change my opinion as to his fitness for the office.

In response to the question of the Senator from Nevada I will say that, as I recall, there was a dissolution of a company; and when the company was dissolved they set aside $25,000 to pay, as they thought, their income tax. Later—and if I am slipping up on some of the testimony I hope the Senator from Delaware will correct me—the company got an assessment of $152,000, I think. They then employed this firm of Washington, Henry & Co., I think the names are, two former employees of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, who in turn employed Helvering. As I remember, one of the officials of the company came to Washington. They met in the Washington Hotel on a Sunday morning. Helvering asked for $10,000 to employ an engineer, a New York engineer, who he said——

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. COUZENS. Just let me finish. I did not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. CLARK. I am sure the Senator does not want to misstate the record.

Mr. COUZENS. The Senator can correct me if I make a mistake. I am not saying that Helvering admits this. I do not charge that. I think he may have denied some of it. I think he afterward testified that he was going to employ an engineer from his own office.

Mr. CLARK. All I wanted to do was to call the Senator's attention to the fact that this man Edgecomb himself appeared on the stand and testified three times that the engineer Helvering wanted to employ was from Washington; and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] refreshed his memory and said he was from New York.

Mr. COUZENS. I desire to say that I was not present when that testimony was given; but it is wholly immaterial to the point I am coming to, because as a matter of fact, as I recall, no engineer was employed.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a moment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. COUZENS. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is twice that the Senator from Missouri has made that statement. No reasonable man can read the record and no reasonable man could have heard him make the statement without realizing that it was a slip of the tongue, pure and simple.

Mr. CLARK. Three slips.

Mr. COUZENS. It does not matter. We do not need to argue those things. This is not a court. Nobody is being tried under criminal law, and nobody is going to be sent to jail. I want the Senate, if possible, to get the impression that I have of the man. That is the deciding question here. It is not a question of whether we are going to send him to jail or whether he is going to be convicted. The question is whether or not he is the straight and honest and reliable kind of man that ought to be placed in such an important position. My observation of the man is that he is not.

Then observe, Mr. President, that after this assessment of $152,000 was received by this man, and after he found that he could not get $10,000 for his engineer, he entered into an agreement to take what was left out of $25,000 that the firm had theretofore put aside to pay its income taxes. Now, remember, all the firm had set aside was $25,000. The Bureau of Internal Revenue had assessed them $152,000. Any reasonable person knows that when Helvering agreed to take what was left out of $25,000 for his fee, he knew that the Government was not going to insist upon its $152,000 assessment.

What happened? They entered into an agreement. The firm say, substantially, they did not have any more money to put up than the $25,000, that they had already set aside. Mr. Helvering entered into an agreement in which he said, in substance, "I will pay the tax out of the $25,000 and take what is left", on a $152,000 assessment.

I was convinced, after observing this man and hearing the testimony, that when Helvering entered into that agreement he knew that the Government never intended to collect $152,000, and that it was a "phony" assessment. The distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] has repeatedly stated on this floor, to his knowledge, that thousands of "phony" assessments were made so that confederates outside of the Bureau of Internal Revenue would get a rake-off from having the assessments reduced.

There is no lack of testimony in that connection. There is plenty of it in evidence before this body; and now, Mr. President, it is proposed to put in charge of that very Bureau a man who participated in that practice. Not only did he participate in the practice, but he divided 60-40 with the crooks that were afterward thrown out. No one denies it. It cannot be denied. He testified that he had a 60-40 arrangement to share in the profits of this concern that afterward was kicked out of the Treasury Department for dishonest conduct. Then, after he got his deal concluded with this taxpayer, he walked over to the Treasury Department and got the $152,000 claim settled for $7,000; and then they split some $18,000 between Washington, Henry & Co. and Helvering.

Mr. President, I am not going to waste a lot of time in discussing this question. I am settling this question in my own mind from a keen observation of the man and his past record in connection with the Bureau of Internal Revenue. Politics, and his conduct in Kansas, have no relation to my decision.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I want to inquire again whether there is anybody else to speak in opposition to this confirmation?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from Kentucky that I hope to reserve some time myself to make some reply.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I inquire again whether I am entitled to conclude the argument in this matter?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will inform the Senator from Delaware that he has 59 minutes remaining.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I am not ready to take it yet.

Mr. BARKLEY. There will be only one more speech on this side, and I insist that I have the right to conclude the argument. If the Senator is going to use any more time, I want him to use it before I speak.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there further discussion?

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, it seems to me that the contention of the Senator from Kentucky is a fair one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will rule on that. Those advocating the confirmation have the affirmative. The burden is, therefore, upon them, and they have the right to conclude.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, there is to be only one more speech on this side in favor of the confirmation of Mr. Helvering, and if there are other arguments to be made in opposition, I insist that I am entitled to have them made before I begin my remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware desire further to be heard?

Mr. HASTINGS. If the President please, I propose to reserve, if I may, sufficient time to answer the argument made on the other side in reply to the arguments I made yesterday and today. That is my expectation, and that is my right, I respectfully submit to the President.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, that demand, I will say, is typical of the unfairness which has been practiced in this case from the beginning. I am entitled to conclude this argument.

Mr. HASTINGS. I have no objection to the Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Kentucky accusing me of all kinds of unfairness. I am making this record, and I will leave it to the Senate and to the country to say whether I have been fair or unfair.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. A point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Chair having ruled that the concluding argument shall be made by those who favor the nomination, and the Senator in charge of allotting the time to those in favor of the nomination having announced that there is only one more speech to be made from that side, if the Senator from Delaware refuses to proceed with the argument now, or if others opposing the nomination decline to proceed, and the Senator from Kentucky takes the floor, will it not result in precluding further argument from those opposed to confirmation?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is of that view.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I think the position of the Senator from Delaware is eminently fair. I think those who are insisting on the confirmation should make their position known, which they have not done up to this time. If the Senator from Kentucky will proceed with his argument to a conclusion, the Senator from Delaware may desire to answer it, and there may be some time left for the Senator from Kentucky. There is no rule by which the Senator from Delaware can be forced to take the floor at this time or at any other time. The orderly procedure and the fair procedure would be for the Senator from Kentucky to proceed. After he has finished his argument——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, in all proceedings with which I am familiar, those on the affirmative side have the right to open and close. The Senator from Oregon is apparently attempting to reverse that.

Mr. McNARY. Not at all.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. And I respectfully suggest that there is no argument to support that contention.

Mr. McNARY. I am not suggesting that. I am suggesting that the Senator from Kentucky proceed now if he wants to speak. At the conclusion of his remarks the Senator from Delaware can use the portion of the time allotted to him. There will be opportunity then for the Senator from Kentucky or anyone else to conclude the argument. But it is not fair, and there is no rule to support the position, that the Senator from Delaware should be forced to take the floor at this time.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, it is perfectly apparent what is intended. The Senator from Delaware spoke 2 hours yesterday and an hour today. At the conclusion of his 2-hour speech yesterday we entered into an agreement to divide the time equally today. He has left 59 minutes, practically an hour, and I have an hour and 15 minutes. If I occupy that hour and 15 minutes now, then the Senator from Delaware will be allowed to occupy an hour in conclusion of the argument, which, I say, under all rules of parliamentary procedure, would be unfair. If I go ahead and speak now and then stop in the middle of my remarks in order that he may occupy his time, it will make it necessary for me to divide my remarks into two speeches, which I do not wish to do. I insist that, in view of this record, I am entitled to conclude the argument.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I am not taking the position the Senator from Kentucky is taking—that I have a right to close the argument. I do not care anything about whether I close the argument or not, but I do want to have an opportunity to reply to what is to be said in favor of confirmation of this nomination.

The Senator from Arkansas points out that the Senator from Oregon is trying to reverse the rule. As a matter of fact, if no objection had been made here, the confirmation would have gone through without argument. I have filed a minority report. I there take the affirmative side, and undertake to sustain the minority report by opening the argument. If I had not made a speech on that subject, the other side would not have made any speech. That shows that the affirmative is upon my side.

I do not care anything about closing the argument, but I do want to have an opportunity to answer the speech made by the Senator from Kentucky if he undertakes to analyze this record, and to show that this man is entitled to confirmation by the Senate.

Mr. CONNALLY. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. CONNALLY. As I understand, the Chair ruled that the Senator from Kentucky is entitled to the closing speech. If the Senator from Delaware does not care to proceed at this time, would it be in order to move that the Senate take a recess until 1:45 o'clock, and thereby allow the Senator from Kentucky to address the Chair in the allotted time, in view of the insistence of the Senator from Delaware that he proceed?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, let me suggest to the Senator from Kentucky that he now proceed with his argument, and we agree that he may have 20 minutes or 30 minutes to close the argument in the case.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I have no desire to split up what I have to say in two speeches. In order to accommodate the Senator from Delaware, I would have to stop in the middle of my remarks and let him reply to the first half of my speech, and then proceed with the last half of it.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, as I understand it, the Senator from Kentucky has an hour and 15 minutes of time left. I do not suppose the Senator from Delaware expects to use all of the 59 minutes that remain to him.

Mr. HASTINGS. Not over 10 minutes.

Mr. REED. May I suggest that the way out of this difficulty is for the Senator from Kentucky to go ahead now and use his entire hour and 15 minutes, and then the Senator from Delaware will share with him the 59 minutes that will remain, so that the Senator from Kentucky can make his whole speech, and need not break it in half, as he seems to be afraid he might have to do.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say to the Senator that I do not even know that I want to use the hour and 15 minutes. I certainly hope that I can conclude in less time than that. But I do not want to be in the position of having to stop in the middle of what I have to say in order that the Senator from Delaware may reply to what I have said up to that time.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I am proposing that the Senator should not have to stop; that he go ahead and make his full speech now, just as though that ended the whole matter, taking the hour and 15 minutes if he wants to, which is the most he could take under the present arrangement; that then, after that, the Senator from Delaware, who, after all, did have yesterday afternoon's time, share the remaining hour with the Senator from Kentucky. We speak of the right to open and close. It is perfectly obvious that if that right were vested in the Senator from Kentucky he never did open. The Senator from Delaware has never had a chance to answer.

Mr. BARKLEY. The fact that I did not open is no reason why I should be denied the right to close.

Mr. REED. Of course it is not.

Mr. BARKLEY. We had a right to hear the objections. We made a report favorable to this man, and we had a right to presume that his nomination would be confirmed unless there were objection, and the objection was made.

Mr. REED. Of course, and the Senator has a right to answer all that has been said by the Senator from Delaware; but he, in common fairness, ought to have some right to reply to what the Senator from Kentucky may say. That is just elemental justice. If he is willing to share his remaining time with the Senator from Kentucky surely that would be a generous act, and would protect everyone.

Mr. BARKLEY. I want it understood that, whatever arrangement is made, I do not know that I even want to reply.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. McNARY. That was the very point I suggested to the Senator from Pennsylvania. The Senator from Delaware has concluded his remarks. He only asks, in common justice, an opportunity to reply to any new matter that may be brought out in the discussion of the subject by the Senator from Kentucky. The Senator from Delaware only wants a few minutes, probably 10 or 15 minutes, to reply. I see every quality of fairness in the proposition that the Senator from Kentucky make his speech in full, then permit the Senator from Delaware to reply briefly, and then, if the Senator from Kentucky desires to close, he will have ample opportunity.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, if that is understood, I have no objection. It is understood that if necessary I will have sufficient time, out of whatever time remains, to reply, if I desire, to the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. McNARY. I think we have a common understanding.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I regret very much that there has drifted into this case what seems to me to be undoubted prejudice.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. May the Chair interrupt the Senator for a moment to say that the 15 minutes which have been consumed in the discussion of the method of procedure will, by unanimous consent, be eliminated entirely from the time to be taken in the argument.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is entirely agreeable.

I regret, as I have said, that what appears to me to be an undeniable element of prejudice has entered into the consideration of this case, and I regret exceedingly to have to include the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] among those who seem to be prejudiced against Mr. Helvering by reason of his appearance, or by reason of his manner when he appeared the first time before the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. It was not the first time he was before the committee. He was before the committee several times, as the Senator knows, before the final testimony was taken.

Mr. BARKLEY. I know he was twice before the committee. The Senator from Michigan was present on one of those occasions, but certainly did not hear all the testimony.

The Senator from Michigan awhile ago made the statement, without the slightest evidence whatever in this record, without even a suspicion of anything that could be regarded as reliable testimony, that he believed that Mr. Helvering while he was practicing a year or two before the Bureau of Internal Revenue had confederates on the inside of that Bureau who assisted him in the tricky settlement of tax cases that were pending before the Internal Revenue Bureau. I am surprised and I am pained that the Senator from Michigan, without any evidence whatever, would give expression to such sentences on the floor of the United States Senate.

Mr. COUZENS. Of course I deny that, and the Senator can challenge the good intention of the Senator from Michigan all he wants to.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator made that statement here, and the RECORD will show it, just as he made a statement a few days ago intimating that there were 30 Members of this body under the control and domination of the power interests.

Mr. COUZENS. That is not true, either.

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Senator did not change the RECORD, he did make that intimation when we were voting on the tax on electric power during the consideration of the tax bill; but I merely mention that as evidence of the fact that the Senator from Michigan, with all his good intentions, with all his fine qualities, draws hasty conclusions as to the character of men with whom he associates.

Mr. COUZENS. And they have proved invariably to be right.

Mr. BARKLEY. According to the Senator's prejudices, of course, his conclusions are invariably right. There have been more underhanded methods resorted to in order to defeat the confirmation of this man Helvering than in any case which has come under my observation since I have been a Member of the United States Senate. The Finance Committee called Mr. Helvering, according to its practice, before it when this nomination was referred to it nearly a month ago. Mr. Helvering was called in to give a sort of résumé of his life and his activities, so that the Finance Committee might size him up, might see him and know something about him. Those of us who had served in the House of Representatives with him knew all about him; we had our own estimation of his character and of his ability; but most of the members of the Finance Committee had not met Mr. Helvering, and, according to the committee's practice in most cases, he was called before them to testify as to his qualifications. The same thing was done with reference to Mr. Acheson, who was appointed Under Secretary of the Treasury, as the same thing has been done with reference to other cases.

When Mr. Helvering came before the committee, without any other member of the committee, so far as I know and so far as the record shows, having been advised of the fact, the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] produced an old record that had been dug out of the Treasury Department, a record which was 14 years old, which Mr. Helvering had never seen, had never heard of and knew nothing about, and the Senator from Delaware began to examine him with reference to certain transactions in 2 or 3 tax cases which I will enter into a little more in detail in a few moments. As a result, a subcommittee was appointed to hold whatever hearings might be necessary, to bring witnesses to Washington to testify, witnesses whose names are in the record which the Senator from Delaware "pulled" on the nominee without his previous knowledge that there was any such record.

I was appointed as chairman of the subcommittee to bring these witnesses to Washington and hear their testimony, to find out whether there was any truthfulness in the insinuations that they had put in the record without the knowledge or without any warning on the part of this nominee. Among those witnesses were a man named Washington and a man named Henry, who had formed a partnership as expert accountants out in Kansas, and who had sent to Mr. Helvering some business involving taxes pending before the Internal Revenue Bureau. After I was appointed chairman of the subcommittee I conferred with the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON], as to bringing these witnesses to Washington. I also conferred with the parliamentary clerk of the Senate to ascertain whether we had a right to summon these witnesses and to pay their expenses. I learned that we did have that right. Then I went about learning where they were, and I discovered that one of them was in California, one of them was in Texas, and one of them still remained in Kansas. Just as I was preparing to send for these witnesses, the Senator from Delaware came over to this side of the aisle and said:

I have found a record in the Treasury Department giving the testimony of one of these men, and if Mr. Helvering is willing to accept that as the testimony of this man, I will agree that you need not send for these witnesses, because one of them is in California and one is in Texas, and therefore it will not be necessary for us to summon these men to Washington to hear their testimony.

I agreed that I would consult with Mr. Helvering and ascertain whether he was willing that the statement which the Senator from Delaware or somebody else had found in the Treasury Department should be accepted as the testimony of, as I recall, Mr. Henry. I saw Mr. Helvering, and he said that he would like to look over it. He did look over it, and reported to me that it would be entirely agreeable for that record to be used as the testimony of Mr. Henry. I notified the Senator from Delaware of that fact; and therefore I did not summon these witnesses before the subcommittee of the Finance Committee.

We went on and had Mr. Helvering before us again. His testimony is outlined here in the record; and it was perfectly apparent that there was nothing to the charges that had been made against him; that they were all ex parte insinuations made by certain men for one reason or another; and while we took no formal vote on it at that meeting, it was perfectly apparent that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] and myself had reached the conclusion that this man's nomination ought to be confirmed; that we intended to make that report to the full committee, and we did make that report to the full committee 2 or 3 days later.

When the full committee met, and the majority of the subcommittee made their report to the full committee, then it was that the Senator from Delaware read a long written minority report in which he practically accused the Senator from Virginia and myself of refusing to summon these witnesses to Washington under the circumstances to which I have referred. I took occasion in the committee to refer to the fact that the Senator from Delaware had come on to this side and suggested that they be not summoned. He did not deny that statement, and he will not now deny it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I was just going to say, recalling the statement made a few moments ago by the Senator from Kentucky, that it was at the instance and suggestion of the Senator from Delaware that the witnesses—certain witnesses—be not summoned and that a statement already of record in the Department should be used, that it is astonishing to learn, if it be the case, that the Senator from Delaware would pursue such a course; that he would take the initiative in having the subcommittee refrain from subpenaing witnesses and then complain that they had not been subpenaed.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is precisely what did occur, as every member of the Finance Committee will testify, including the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD].

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. DUFFY in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I think the Senator from Arkansas does not understand——

Mr. BARKLEY. If the Senator from Delaware is going to make a speech, he will have an opportunity to reply. I have not finished.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, if the Senator from Kentucky will permit me, I understand fully the statement made by the Senator from Kentucky, and it implies a course of conduct on the part of the Senator from Delaware that cannot be compared favorably with anything charged against Mr. Helvering.

Mr. BARKLEY. I want to say in addition to that——

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

Mr. BARKLEY. Just a moment; I do not yield at this point. After the minority report had been filed with the full committee by the Senator from Delaware, I think he took the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] and myself to task for not summoning these men to Washington, and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] and I stated to the full committee exactly what I have said here. Then the Senator from Delaware further insisted that these men be brought to Washington, and, without a dissenting voice so far as I recall, the full committee ordered that these men be brought to Washington; they were brought here at Government expense, and testified as the record here will show. I mention it only as evidence of the tactics which have been resorted to in this case, of the effort to besmirch this man, and the effort to delay action on the part of the Senate until Congress might adjourn so that there would be no action on the matter of confirming the nomination for Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to ask the Senator if the effect of this maneuver on the part of the Senator from Delaware in asking that witnesses not be brought before the subcommittee and then insisting that they be brought before the full committee was not to delay any action on this matter for about a week or 10 days?

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Delaware can answer that question; but the result was that action was delayed for about 2 weeks.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield, but I cannot yield for a speech.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am not going to make a speech, but I want to explain to the Senator from Arkansas the situation with respect to the witnesses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield for that purpose?

Mr. BARKLEY. How long will it take?

Mr. HASTINGS. A minute or two.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will yield the Senator 2 minutes.

Mr. HASTINGS. I want to say that there was a witness whom it was necessary from my point of view for the committee to hear, namely, Henry, because in the testimony he had given before the Department he said there was a definite contract between him and Helvering with respect to fees, and that was different from what Helvering had stated. He was the only witness that I cared anything about. When we got before the committee Helvering made another long statement, in which he changed his whole testimony—or not the whole of it, but most of his testimony—which made it necessary, after I had heard it, in my judgment, to seek to get the other witness here.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator did not renew his request or his demand that these witnesses be brought here until the subcommittee had made its report to the full committee. Then, when we had made our report recommending favorable action, he demanded that these witnesses all be brought to Washington, thereby causing a delay of about 2 weeks in the consideration of this matter.

Not only that, Mr. President, but as chairman of the subcommittee handling this matter as the agent of the Finance Committee, I was entitled to be furnished every bit of the evidence in the Treasury Department with reference to Mr. Helvering. After I was appointed chairman of the subcommittee, and after the Senator from Delaware had produced a report in the full committee, upon which he cross-examined Mr. Helvering without Mr. Helvering ever having known there was any such report, I called up the Treasury Department and talked to Mr. Irey, the Chief of the Intelligence Service, who, in my judgment, has been furnishing the Senator from Delaware all the evidence that he has found in the Department. I asked Mr. Irey whether there was any additional report, whether there was any additional evidence, whether there were any additional documents in the Treasury Department that would shed any light upon this matter. I told him that I was chairman of the subcommittee, and that I was entitled to any such evidence. Mr. Irey replied to me that there was nothing else in the Treasury; that the Senator from Delaware had received the only report that was there, and that there was nothing else there that shed any light upon Mr. Helvering's activities in the Department of the Treasury. Yet at the very next meeting of the subcommittee the Senator from Delaware showed up with a report that was a foot thick which he had gotten from the very agencies which had denied to me, as chairman of the subcommittee, that there was any such evidence there or that I might have an opportunity to see it.

I point these things out, Mr. President, in order to show that down in the Treasury Department there is a little clique of Mellon appointees who do not want this man made Commissioner of Internal Revenue because they fear—and I hope to heaven the fear may be justified—that he will "fire" every one of them before he is there a week. I know what I am talking about, because I have received evidence from men on the inside of the Department, who have told me all about the little schemes that have been hatched up in the Treasury Department to defeat this man's confirmation.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. DILL. What is the name of the gentleman who failed to give the Senator the report?

Mr. BARKLEY. His name is Irey, and he is head of the Intelligence Bureau of the Internal Revenue Bureau of the Treasury Department.

Mr. DILL. Either he lacked intelligence when he talked to him, or he lacked integrity.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield for a question.

Mr. HASTINGS. Is it not true that I turned over several reports to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Delaware turned over certain reports to me after they had been turned over to him first by the agents in the Treasury Department. Every bit of this evidence and all of the reports that I received were received by me from the Senator from Delaware and not from anybody in the Treasury Department, and some of them only after I requested them. When the Senator from Delaware first presented the report to the full committee, which none of us had heard anything about, I asked to see it. Later the Senator sent the other one to my office at my request. I am not accusing the Senator from Delaware of refusing to turn over the reports. I say that as chairman of the subcommittee I had the right to them, at least an equal right with the Senator from Delaware, who was a minority member of the subcommittee. So much for that.

Now, Mr. President, what about Mr. Helvering? I was elected to Congress in 1912. I went into the House of Representatives on the 4th of March 1913, on the day on which Woodrow Wilson took the oath of office as President of the United States. On that same day Guy T. Helvering became a Member of Congress from the State of Kansas. It was at that time an unusual thing for a Democrat to be elected to the National House of Representatives from the State of Kansas, and it has been a rather unusual thing since, although it is not so unusual at the present time. At this moment there sits on the floor of the Senate a distinguished Member from the other body who, during most of the time from then until now, has been the only Democratic Representative from the State of Kansas. I refer to Representative AYRES.

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Certainly.

Mr. McGILL. In order that the record may be clear I should like to say to the Senator that there are three Members of the House of Representatives sitting on this floor at the present time who are Democrats from the State of Kansas.

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; as a result of the last election the proportion has been somewhat changed.

I served for 6 years in the House of Representatives with Mr. Helvering. Mr. Helvering was looked upon not only by Democrats but by Republicans as an honest, hard-working, conscientious representative of the people. During his 6-year term he had an honor conferred upon him which comes to but few men in such a short service. He was made a member of the Ways and Means Committee, which is the ambition of almost every man who comes to the House of Representatives, because that is regarded as the most important and most distinguished committee of the House of Representatives. During his 6 year's service in the House Mr. Helvering became a member of the Committee on Ways and Means and as a member of that committee he helped to frame the income-tax laws of 1916 and of 1917. In the November election of 1918 Mr. Helvering was defeated, along with many other Democrats, by reason of the issues that had grown out of the war and he was retired to private life. When he retired on the 4th of March 1919 I dare say he had no expectation that he would ever enter public life again. He went back to Kansas, located in Salina, organized a bank, and became the president of that bank.

In the fall of 1919, Mr. Helvering made a visit to Kansas City, and while there, more or less accidentally, the auditor of a department store in Kansas City whom he knew began to complain about the interpretation of the Treasury Department with reference to the income tax law as having to do with consolidated returns. The department store had a subsidiary or affiliate known as a "building company of some kind." They had contended that they had a right to make a consolidated return to the Treasury, and the Treasury had denied them the right to make the consolidated return. Knowing that Mr. Helvering had been a member of the Ways and Means Committee, and that he had helped to write the income-tax law of 1917, the auditor of the department store began to berate the Treasury and to berate Mr. Helvering because they had been denied the right to make a consolidated return.

In the conversation Mr. Helvering took the position that the Treasury was wrong about it; that the department store was entitled to make a consolidated return; and he said, "When I am in Washington again" or "if I go back there again" or "if you want me to look into it for you I would be glad to do it, because I think the Treasury is wrong." As the result of that conversation Mr. Helvering did take up the matter with the Treasury Department and convinced them that they were in error, and they allowed this concern to make a consolidated return, which reduced the tax which they were to pay for that year.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Kentucky what year that was?

Mr. BARKLEY. The conversation was in the fall of 1919. I think the tax of the previous year was involved. However, that is not material. The conversation in Kansas City occurred in the fall of 1919, months after Mr. Helvering had retired from Congress and had gone back to Kansas and had become president of the bank at Salina.

From time to time business was brought to Mr. Helvering, because, I suppose, of the publicity given his success in that particular case. Be that as it may, there was a firm of accountants out in Kansas known as "Washington, Henry & Co." Up to this time Mr. Helvering had never known anything about Washington or heard of him, so far as I know. He said he did not know him, but he had known Mr. Henry for a number of years. Washington and Henry had been internal-revenue agents out in Kansas, one of them having been appointed deputy collector and then promoted to the position of internal-revenue agent, which, I believe, is a Civil Service appointment. One of them remained in the service for a couple of years, and the other remained probably a little longer; but they resigned from the Treasury Department, not at the same time, not by collusion. Bear in mind that when this case first appeared before the Finance Committee an effort was made to show that almost simultaneously with the retirement of Mr. Helvering from the House of Representatives on the 4th of March 1919 these two internal-revenue agents had resigned and that the three of them, acting in collusion, had gone into partnership to use their experience and their information in order to obtain tax cases before the Treasury Department of the United States.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield for a question.

Mr. HASTINGS. Who made that intimation to the committee?

Mr. BARKLEY. My recollection is that the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] did so in their questions.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am equally sure that I did not.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator did not make any direct charge of that sort, but from the questions he propounded to Mr. Helvering as to when he retired from Congress and when the revenue agents retired from the Department, that was the only inference that could be drawn. The facts are that one of the men retired long before Mr. Helvering was defeated in the election of 1918, and he did not even know him at the time he retired. He did not even know him when he came to Washington to represent the department store in the matter of the consolidated return.

Anyhow, these two men formed a partnership in Kansas. They had an office in Wichita and one in Kansas City, I believe. I think the man named "Henry" operated the office at Wichita and the man named "Washington" operated the office in Kansas City, although I may be mistaken as to that. It does not make any particular difference.

Business began to come to Mr. Helvering, and he established an office in Washington, D.C., I think in December 1919, after he had retired from Congress on the 4th of March previous. The firm of Washington, Henry & Co., as tax accountants, with offices in Wichita and Kansas City, sent Mr. Helvering some business. They sent him a number of cases, although he testified that the business which was sent to him was a small proportion of the business that came to him while he maintained an office here in Washington. He testified that business came to him from Oklahoma. The question of depletion and discovery with reference to oil wells became involved in tax matters after the act of 1917, and he testified that a case came to him from Oklahoma involving the question of depletion and discovery, which is a rather technical subject with reference to taxation under the income tax law. Mr. Helvering came to Washington to represent an oil company, in which case the question of deductions on account of depletion and discovery wells was involved. He won that case before the Treasury Department, and as a result other cases came to him from oil companies.

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] had a lot to say about an oil company called the "Trapshooters Oil Co.", and a case involving the Slim Jim Oil & Gas Co. I do not know anything about how the people of Kansas and Oklahoma select the names of their oil companies. Naturally the name "Slim Jim" would carry with it an implication of some kind that ought to be prejudicial. As to the Trapshooters Oil Co.—bear in mind it is not "crapshooters", but it is "trapshooters"—that company was so named because a number of sportsmen were out trapshooting in a certain section of Kansas and they rather incidentally and perhaps as a matter of sportsmanship bought up a lease on some land and decided to drill a well on it and call it the "Trapshooters Oil & Gas Co."

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, the Senator from Kentucky does not hold me responsible for the particular names that were selected for these oil companies, does he?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I do not. I think if the Senator had had anything to do with choosing the names, the names would have been even worse. [Laughter.]

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. LONG. I was very much disappointed to find that the name was "Trapshooters." I was hopeful that it was a more honorable name and one better understood in the Senate.

Mr. BARKLEY. The name is not "Crapshooters." The mind of the Senator from Louisiana is on an entirely different matter from the one which I have in mind and am discussing. [Laughter.]

At any rate, the one company was called the "Trapshooters Oil Co.", and the other one was called the "Slim Jim Oil & Gas Co." The questions involved in those two cases were entirely different. The Senator from Delaware has undertaken to pursue the Trapshooters case and the Slim Jim case to such an extent that I am sure he would be able to qualify as "Hawkshaw the detective" in any comic strip in any newspaper in the United States of America.

What are the facts about the Trapshooters case? I want to mention that case first. The Trapshooters Oil Co., as they finally went on with it, drilled a well in Kansas on this tract of land that they had gathered together. It was a discovery well. When it came in it was what was known as a "gusher." I think the testimony shows that it was the largest single oil well ever brought in in Kansas. I may be mistaken as to that, but I think that is correct. It was such a large well and so unexpectedly large that they had no facilities whatever for taking care of the oil. They had to form pools out of dirt. They gathered the oil together in ponds and in pools and by damming it up with mud and dirt, but before they could make any connections or bring in any facilities whatever for taking care of the oil they tried to cap the well, and in doing so brought salt water into it to such an extent that it was of practically no value whatever. They finally sold the entire property for $50,000.

It is perfectly easy to explain this nightmare that has been brought in here with reference to the Trapshooters Oil Co. They brought in one well which, if it had been maintained, or if other wells of its like had been brought in, would have made these men millionaires over and over again; but while they were trying in an emergency to provide some method of taking care of the oil it went into salt water, and all they got out of it was the oil they had been able to gather in their haste by building these earthen pools, or whatever it was they used to save the oil that was running out of the well. Finally, as I have said, they sold the entire property for $50,000.

They knew there would be some taxes levied against them by the Federal Government probably, and they set aside more than half of what they got for the property to meet any taxes that might be assessed. They set aside $25,817 and some cents. I do not know how they arrived at that amount, but that is what they laid aside. They earmarked it and put it away to meet any tax that might be levied against them.

This firm of Washington, Henry & Co. sent this case to Mr. Helvering. Whether they brought it up here at first, or whether they sent it by mail, I do not know. There is some controversy about whether they first saw him in the Washington Hotel here or whether they saw him in the office of the company down at Wichita.

The Senator from Delaware produced this report down here in the Treasury in which a man named "Edgecomb", who was the secretary and treasurer of the company, made an affidavit undertaking to say that Helvering had tried to hold him up for $10,000 in a room down here in the Washington Hotel, claiming that he had to employ an engineer in New York, in order to boost the fee above what it ordinarily would have been otherwise. That is the whole object of this tirade here on the Trapshooters Oil Co. They started out to prove that Mr. Helvering was a crook; and, being unable to do that, now they want to prove that he is a liar. That is all there is to it.

This man said that they came to Washington, and on one Sunday morning they met here in the Hotel Washington. There was a $152,000 tax assessed against this company, which is not a very strange thing in view of the fact that this enormous well had been brought in out there. It would have been a very modest tax if that well had turned out to be worth anything. They had assessed a preliminary tax of $152,000. They employed Mr. Helvering through the firm of Washington, Henry & Co., who were tax accountants in Kansas, and some of them evidently came on to Washington to talk to him about it.

This man Edgecomb, who was the secretary of the company, said that in the hotel here the question of Mr. Helvering's fee came up. Helvering told them that it might require a survey. That is what they say. I do not suppose Helvering at that time knew whether the survey would be required or not. It was the rule, in cases of that sort, to require a survey. Mr. Helvering states that he did demand a $10,000 fee; that he said that if there was a survey to be made $10,000 would cover his fee and the expenses of an engineer, and that he had an engineer in his own office who did that kind of work for him, and there was no occasion to say anything about a New York engineer; that he had no New York engineer; that he never had any dealings with a New York engineer, and that he did not even know a New York engineer.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. I wish to inquire of the Senator whether he can point out any place in the record where Mr. Helvering, the first day he was testifying, denied that it was necessary to have an engineer. He stated positively that he told them it was necessary to have an engineer but he had one in his own office.

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, well, suppose he did. It was a new case that had just come to him. He knew that, as a rule, a man had to have an engineer to go out and make a survey of oil property. Suppose he did say, "It will be necessary to have an engineer"—what of it?

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. I want to apologize to the Senator from Kentucky for a statement I made just prior to leaving the Senate for my luncheon. I ask now to make it, so that I can go to a meeting of the Banking and Currency Committee.

The Senator referred to a statement I made in the RECORD, I think on May 11; and when I answered the Senator I thought I said "representing the interests." The Senator was correct. I did say "power interests", and "power interests" is in the RECORD. I did not change it; and I apologize to the Senator for contradicting him.

Mr. BARKLEY. I accept the Senator's apology for contradicting me, but I think he ought to apologize to the Senate for making the original statement.

Mr. COUZENS. Would the Senator like me to name them all? The Senator from Kentucky would not want me to name them all, would he?

Mr. BARKLEY. Yes; so far as I am concerned, the Senator can name them. Yes; go on and name them now. The Senator has brought this matter up.

Mr. COUZENS. I beg the Senator's pardon; the Senator from Kentucky brought it up.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Michigan brought it up a week or 10 days ago. If the Senator wants to name any Senator on this floor who is a tool of the power interests, name him.

Mr. COUZENS. I should not like to do that, because I might make a mistake.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator asked me if I wanted him to do it. I say, yes, I should like him to do it.

Mr. COUZENS. I said I might make a mistake.

Mr. BARKLEY. I thought the Senator from Michigan never made a mistake. He said a while ago that he never made any.

Mr. COUZENS. Oh, no; I never said that.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator said that he was always correct; that in his estimation of men he was always correct; that he never had made a mistake. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POPE in the chair). The Senate will be in order.

Mr. BARKLEY. Now let us get back to the Trapshooters' case.

There is a dispute, which I think is totally inconsequential—a misunderstanding, or a lack of memory on the part of somebody—as to what occurred with reference to the fee Mr. Helvering was to receive in the Trapshooters' case.

Mr. Helvering at the time he testified when this report was first brought to his attention said that this had been 14 years ago; that he had many cases at that time, and, of course, he could not remember all the details as to negotiations about a man's fee in a lawsuit. I challenge any lawyer on the floor of the United States Senate to go back 14 years, without having his memory refreshed in some way or other, and give to the Senate or to any committee the details of conversations that occurred between him and his clients by reason of which they arrived at what he would charge as a fee to represent them in any controversy.

The secretary of this company said that the conversation occurred here in Washington; that Mr. Helvering demanded a $10,000 fee to represent a company against which had been assessed a $152,000 tax, which I will say was not an unreasonable fee considering the amount involved. Mr. Edgecomb finally proposed to produce what he claimed was a copy of the contract, and said that the contract that was finally entered into was that Helvering agreed to take whatever he might save out of this $25,000 that had been set aside by the company for taxes when it sold its entire property for $50,000.

All of their recollections evidently were refreshed by looking at some sort of records or thinking about the matter, because one of the directors of the Trapshooters Co. came on here and testified—his testimony is in the record—that this conversation really occurred out in Kansas, not in Washington, and that the agreement on the fee was entered into in the office of the company in Wichita, Kans.; and that out in Kansas Mr. Helvering insisted on a $10,000 straight fee to represent a company against which there had been a $152,000 tax assessed by the Treasury. Well, their gusher well had gone to water. They had nothing. They had sold their entire property for $50,000. I dare say they could not have paid the $152,000, or anything like it, if the assessment had been finally determined upon according to those figures. It was testified that finally somebody in the company said, "Well, we do not want to send good money after bad money, and we will enter into this sort of an arrangement with you: We will pay you $2,500 in cash, and we will give you all above that that you save out of the $25,000 we have set aside for taxes."

Is there anything crooked about that? How many lawyers are there in this Chamber who, when a client came to them, first demanded a straight fee, but upon discovering that circumstances might justify them in taking a contingent fee instead of a straight fee have not done it? There is not a lawyer in the United States of any general practice who has not had that experience.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do.

Mr. LONG. It was Abraham Lincoln's advice that a lawyer should not take a straight fee; that he should always have a contingent fee.

Mr. BARKLEY. I recall that advice, because in that case the pay would be determined by the success of the lawyer in winning the case. There are thousands and hundreds of thousands of cases in all the courts of this country where, if a lawyer was unwilling to take a contingent fee, honest men would go without representation before courts and juries, because, in order to get into court at all, they are compelled to make a contract with their lawyer that if they win the case the attorney will receive a certain fee, but if they do not win it the attorney gets no fee whatever.

Every lawyer knows that that is true; and yet because, after long negotiations, whether they occurred in Washington or in Kansas, Mr. Helvering was willing to come down from his $10,000 demand for a fee and accept $2,500 in cash and take the rest of it on a contingent basis, we are asked to deny this man confirmation on the part of the United States Senate.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do.

Mr. CLARK. I should like to suggest to the Senator that the record shows that the proposition that was finally entered into was made by Mr. Edgecomb himself as a counter proposition to Helvering's $10,000 flat fee.

Mr. BARKLEY. Absolutely. If we may admit that whether in Washington or in Kansas Mr. Helvering demanded a $10,000 fee—and I do not think it makes any difference whether it was in Washington or in Kansas—the counter proposition came from the company to pay him $2,500 cash, and then allow him whatever he might save out of this $25,000 that had been set aside for taxes.

Was that an unreasonable fee? Was it an unreasonable agreement between them?

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. BARKLEY. I do.

Mr. HATFIELD. Was that the entire amount that he received?

Mr. BARKLEY. That was the entire amount he received. He got the difference between the $25,000 and what they finally settled the case for. In other words, he got the $2,500 as a retainer, and then he received the difference between the $25,000 and the $7,000, which turned out to be about $18,000.

Was it an unreasonable settlement that the Treasury Department made? In order to convict Mr. Helvering of any wrongdoing in that case we will have to convict the Treasury of the United States, because this settlement was made by the officers of the Treasury. Senators know the law with reference to depletion and discovery wells in the matter of assessing income taxes against oil companies; and when the Treasury found that this one well the company had brought in as a gusher had gone into water and that they had sold their entire property for $50,000, the Treasury reduced the amount of the tax from $152,000, which they had assessed upon the theory that the property was worth something and that the income tax was due, and agreed to accept $7,000 as an income tax in lieu of the original amount that they assessed against this company.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. Does not the record show that since the final settlement of the Trapshooters' case the record has been three times reviewed by the Treasury Department, and in each case it was found that the settlement was for the correct amount?

Mr. BARKLEY. The record shows that that particular case and this other case that so much noise has been made about, the Slim Jim Oil Co. case, have been examined over and over again; and in the report that was made by this man Partridge and this man Ofterdahl, who was appointed by President Hoover collector of internal revenue in California, and withdrawn because of the opposition of the Senator from California [Mr. JOHNSON], as Members of the Senate may recall, he said that there was an investigation of the firm of Washington, Henry & Co., and that in view of the fact that Helvering had represented them in Washington they were trying to find something against Helvering; but after they had investigated they were told by the assistant to Mr. Blair, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, that these cases had been gone over by men in the Treasury Department who were experts on the subject, and that every one of them had been settled in accordance with the law and regulations.

What about the Slim Jim case? So far as there is anything in the record against Mr. Helvering, it is a "slim-jim" case, indeed.

The Slim Jim Oil Co. was located in Kansas, I believe. There had been an assessment of an additional tax against them of $1,211,000. They had been trying for 2 years to get an adjustment of that tax. They made no progress; they got nowhere at the Treasury Department. I do not know whether it was because they had an incompetent attorney, or what the reason was; at least, he could not bring about a settlement. They had nobody in Washington representing them. They employed a Kansas firm to represent this company in the matter of adjusting this tax. After a delay of about 2 years, somebody recommended Mr. Helvering. Whether it was Washington, or Henry, or both of them together, makes no difference. At any rate, Mr. Helvering and Mr. Jouett Shouse were recommended to them as attorneys who had been successful in practice before the Bureau of Internal Revenue, and they were told that if they were in their place, they would employ Mr. Helvering to represent them in Washington. They did employ Mr. Helvering, agreed to pay him a fee of $25,000, and they paid him that fee.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. At that time he had had but one case before the Department, the record shows.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is a very important circumstance against Helvering. I suppose he ought to be rejected because up to that time he had had only one case. At any rate, he was employed in this case for a fee of $25,000.

Mr. Helvering contended what evidently had not been contended by the attorneys who had represented this company previously, that under section 210 of the income tax law of 1917 they were entitled to be considered as other companies engaged in the same business had been considered, and that the Treasury should make a lump-sum settlement of the tax under section 210 of the internal-revenue tax law. Section 210 of the tax law is quite an involved section. I do not pretend that I can explain altogether just what it means, although I voted for it. The section provides:

> That if the Secretary of the Treasury is unable in any case satisfactorily to determine the invested capital, the amount of the deduction shall be the sum of (1) an amount equal to the same proportion of the net income of the trade or business received during the taxable year as the proportion which the average deduction (determined in the same manner as provided in section 203, without including the $3,000 or $6,000 therein referred to) for the same calendar year of representative corporations, partnerships, and individuals, engaged in a like or similar trade or business.

When Mr. Helvering took over this case for the Slim Jim Oil Co. he contended before the Treasury Department that they were entitled to a settlement under section 210. He went before the Department, he appeared as their attorney, he had conferences with the men in charge of the oil section in the Treasury, he had conferences with their tax committee. On yesterday the Senator from Delaware undertook to make a point against Mr. Helvering because he could not remember how many members there were on the committee in the Treasury Department which had charge of considering a tax of this sort. Whether there were five or ten or a hundred or a thousand makes no difference. Mr. Helvering appeared before them and represented that, under section 210 of the revenue act, this company was entitled to a settlement based upon what might be regarded as a compromise.

Mr. President, we all know that the Treasury Department compromises tax cases every day and every week and every year. That was all Mr. Helvering contended for, that under this section they were entitled to the assessment of a lump sum, based upon the treatment accorded others engaged in the same kind of business and as to which other settlements were being made in the oil division.

They finally agreed to make a settlement under section 210. The memorandum in this record, made by the Deputy Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Mr. Batson, I believe, who was next in authority to Mr. Blair, the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, shows that that case was settled according to Mr. Helvering's contention under section 210.

Mr. Helvering did not know what the amount would be when he persuaded the Treasury Department to settle the case under section 210. He considered that he had won his point, and that it only remained for the Treasury Department to make the calculations as to the amount, and he did not appear any more in the case.

They made their calculations and wrote a letter to the Slim Jim Oil Co., fixing the tax at $459,000, and the company wrote to Mr. Helvering, their attorney, and said, "That is the amount they have assessed against us, and we are going to pay it." They did pay it, and Helvering dropped out of the case.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator will recall that, although the Senator from Delaware had this whole record in his possession, the only member of the committee who had access to it, including the memorandum on review from the auditor of the Treasury Department setting forth that this case had been settled under section 210, the Senator from Delaware was not fair enough to put that into the record, and it remained for Mr. Helvering's counsel to drag it out and put it in the record.

Mr. HASTINGS. Where is it in the record, may I ask?

Mr. CLARK. I cited it to the Senator yesterday.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the Senator from Delaware did not put it in, that is all I can say; he did not put it in, and the counsel for Mr. Helvering did put it into the record.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky yield to me?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. Helvering decided, or at least he came to the conclusion, after he had convinced the Treasury Department that the Treasury Department should settle with this concern under section 210, that he had completed what he started out to accomplish?

Mr. BARKLEY. Absolutely. From that time on it was a matter of calculation down there among the experts as to how much the tax would be. They made that calculation and wrote a letter to the company in Kansas fixing the tax at $459,000, which was paid, and after Mr. Helvering had convinced them that that was the proper way to make the settlement he left Washington, or he left the Treasury, without any idea of how much the amount would be when it was finally calculated. He did not know how much the tax would be until his clients wrote him a letter and said they had received that notice, and they had decided to pay it.

Mr. HATFIELD. And the original amount of the tax was how much?

Mr. BARKLEY. One million two hundred and eleven thousand dollars. In the meantime there was a change in administration, a new regime came into the Treasury Department, and for whatever reason—I suppose for reasons which they thought were sufficient—they decided to reopen the Slim Jim Oil Co. case. They notified the company that they were going to reopen it and assess an additional amount against them for the tax.

The company approached Mr. Helvering to go on and represent them in that reopening. When he got down into the Treasury and found that, instead of making that settlement under section 210, as he had thought and as he had argued, they had made some readjustment of the income from 1917 back to 1916, because the negotiations for the sale of the property took place in 1916, although the actual documents for the sale were made out in 1917, he came to the conclusion that somebody in the Treasury Department or the accountants who had brought the case to him had not been fair with him, that they had not made the calculation according to his contention, and he refused to have anything more to do with the case, and did not. I contend that instead of using that as evidence of the dishonesty of Guy Helvering, it was to his everlasting credit that he would not have anything more to do with that case, because they had not made the calculation, as he thought, in accordance with the agreement he had entered into with the Treasury as to the basis upon which they decided the case. Not only that, not only did he have nothing more to do with the Slim Jim Oil Co. case, but he had nothing more to do with the firm of accountants who had sent him the case.

Mr. President, based upon this proceeding and this investigation about the Slim Jim Oil Co. and about the Trapshooters Oil Co., which is the basis of the report the Senator from Delaware sprung on the committee and on Mr. Helvering at our first session, an investigation was made of Henry and Washington to determine whether they had been guilty of any such unethical conduct as to bar them from practice before the Treasury Department. It turned out, as a matter of fact, that they had never been admitted to practice but as accountants they had gone in with their attorneys and, I think, had sat with them in the informal discussions concerning these cases.

As the result of this investigation they recommended that Washington be barred from practice before the Treasury, but that Henry be allowed to be reinstated. As a matter of fact, it turned out that he had never been admitted, as I have said, but he was later admitted to practice before the Department, and, so far as I know, is now a registered practicing accountant before the Bureau of Internal Revenue.

Mr. Helvering had already severed his connection with the firm, because he discovered that Mr. Washington had admitted to him that, in the calculation and in the making of an amended return, with which Helvering had nothing to do, they had not based their calculation upon his agreement. When that matter was first brought to his attention he used the expression that they had tried to "juggle the figures", and when he found that they had tried to juggle the figures, as he thought then, he refused to have anything more to do with the case, and never from that day on accepted another case from Washington, Henry & Co. I say that is to his credit rather than to his discredit. That is absolutely all there is in these two cases.

How much time have I, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has about 18 minutes left.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, something has been said here about Mr. Helvering's conduct as chairman of the Democratic committee, and as director of highways of the State of Kansas. Senators will all remember that 2 years ago Mr. Woodring was elected Governor of the State of Kansas. It is not necessary to go into the circumstances of that election. He was elected and became Governor, and as such, he appointed a highway commission, and that highway commission named Mr. Helvering as the director of highways of Kansas. The uncontroverted testimony in this record, not only of Democrats but of Republicans, is that during Mr. Helvering's 2 years as director of highways more roads were built in Kansas in proportion to the amount of money spent than in any other State in the American Union.

Mr. Helvering was also chairman of the Democratic State committee. There was a man named Scott who was treasurer of that committee, and after the campaign of 1930 there was a deficit of about $12,000 in the party treasury. Mr. Helvering, as State chairman, wrote letters to the various counties asking for contributions to take up that $12,000 deficit. He wrote to some chairmen who wrote back to him that they had already paid their share, and they produced the checks which they had sent to Mr. Scott, the treasurer, which had been cashed by him and had been canceled, but the amounts represented by them never turned in to the State committee.

As a result, Mr. Helvering fired the treasurer of the Democratic committee, and he took that matter before the State committee, and he was upheld unanimously at the State convention. They had no treasurer then, and Mr. Woodring's campaign was over and there were to be no activities particularly until another campaign should come on, so Mr. Helvering had charge of the committee, and he collected enough money to pay off this deficit, and they fired this defaulting treasurer from the committee, who, by the way, wrote a letter against Mr. Helvering. This man Scott writes a letter to the Senator from Delaware, which the Senator puts in the RECORD, opposing confirmation of Guy T. Helvering, when it turns out that the thing he has against Mr. Helvering is that Helvering fired him because he was crooked and because he did not turn over to the State committee the money he had collected as treasurer of that committee.

Later on last fall, in August, under the law of Kansas they had what they call a party council, made up of all the candidates, those for Governor, for all State offices, for the legislature in both branches, for Congress, for United States Senator, and for county offices, composed altogether of about 290 or 300 men. They held their party council in Topeka; they unanimously endorsed what Mr. Helvering had done to select a new treasurer. Although the man Scott, who makes the charge against him, was there and made complaint against Helvering in the committee, they unanimously sustained Mr. Helvering in all that he had done about it.

Complaint is made because while Mr. Helvering was State chairman contributions were taken up from State employees to help pay the expenses of the campaign. I do not know to what extent that custom prevails in other States, but there is a very general feeling, I think, among Democrats and Republicans alike, that men who are given lucrative positions ought to make some contributions to pay the expenses of the campaign. I do not know whether that is a violation of any man's lofty convictions with reference to political ethics, but I dare say there is not a State in the American Union where men who hold office under an administration do not make contributions to the campaign fund of their party to win the election whenever an election is being held.

Mr. Helvering, as chairman of the State committee, conducted the campaign of 1932. The committee decided to ask contributions of State employees. The testimony here is to the effect that more than half of them made no contributions at all, and not a single man who made no contribution has been "fired" from his position as a result.

The head of every institution, the head of every department, was asked to take up these contributions, and the undisputed testimony here is that last year they raised in Kansas $69,000 to conduct a campaign involving Members of Congress, United States Senators, governor, members of the legislature, Presidential electors, and county officers—$69,000. And that the amount paid into the campaign fund, instead of being 5 percent or 10 percent, as the Senator from Delaware contends, amounted to an average of 1.9 percent of 2 years' salary, which if computed on the basis of an annual contribution would amount to nine tenths of 1 percent of a year's salary. Because of that we are now asked to reject Mr. Helverings' nomination.

It is said there was no accounting made of the campaign fund. The Senator from Delaware this morning said that there was no accounting made by Mr. Helvering of the amount of money that he had received. I know that either before the full Finance Committee or the subcommittee, I read a statement from the chairman, which was supposed to have gone into the record. I do not know whether it is there or not, but I have it here. The Senator from Delaware was present and heard me read it. Here is a telegram which I read to the full committee in the presence of the Senator from Delaware. It was supposed to become a part of the record, and it was returned to me by the reporter after it had been used for the record. Whether or not it appears in the record I do not know; I have not had an opportunity to look at the record; but here it is:

[Telegram]

TOPEKA, KANS., May 16, 1933.

Hon. ALBEN W. BARKLEY,
United States Senator:

At the official Democratic State council, held at Topeka, Kans., August 30, 1932, Elmer Scott, former treasurer of Democratic State committee, presented charges against Chairman Guy T. Helvering concerning the handling of State committee finances. Helvering presented to the council an audit of the books of the State committee by State account. After discussion of charges made the party council unanimously adopted the following resolution, offered by Frank Hodges, of Olathe:

"Resolved, That the Democratic Party council, assembled at Topeka, Kans., as provided by law, approved and adopted the audit and report submitted by Guy T. Helvering, and that the council give Mr. Helvering a vote of thanks for his efficient and unselfish service."

Following the adoption of this report Mr. Helvering was reelected chairman of the State committee without a dissenting vote.

HETTICK,
Secretary Democratic Party Council.

And yet, in spite of that, the Senator from Delaware undertakes to leave the impression here that there was no accounting of the funds collected by Mr. Helvering in that State.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, may I inquire does the Senator from Kentucky call what he has read an accounting?

Mr. BARKLEY. Do I call that an accounting? Of course I do not call that an accounting; but I cite it as evidence of the fact that there was an accounting made before the only committee where it had a right to be made. The Senator from Delaware certainly does not expect that Mr. Helvering would account to him for his conduct in looking after the finances of the Kansas Democracy.

Mr. HASTINGS. The Senator this morning said, in reference to something I said, that the report of the audit was in the record. That is what I was referring to.

Mr. BARKLEY. I did not say that. I said testimony was here showing that an audit was made. That is what I said.

In addition to that, there is a statement here by a member of the Democratic committee showing in great detail, which I have not time to read, that Mr. Helvering made an itemized statement to the committee of every dollar he had received and where it had gone, which was unanimously adopted, and Mr. Helvering was thanked for his efficiency in connection with the matter.

Mr. President, just one other thing with reference to the effort that has been made here to convict Mr. Helvering of having sold post offices out in Kansas. They have gone all over Kansas to pick up everybody who had any enmity against Mr. Helvering, and I have no doubt there are many there who have had enmity against him, because Senators may recall that the Governor of Kansas a year or two ago instituted proceedings against Henry L. Doherty and the Cities Service Co. and compelled them to reduce their gas charges in the cities of Kansas, and that Mr. Guy Helvering was one of the active spirits behind that movement on the part of the Governor of the State. It may be recalled that Henry L. Doherty bought a newspaper in Kansas City—the Kansas City Journal—with which to fight Governor Woodring and Helvering; and it has been largely due to the malice of this outfit in Kansas that every disappointed applicant for a post office, that every sorehead, that everyone who was not employed by the highway commission has been willing to fill this record with denunciatory letters impugning the motives and impeaching the character and reputation of Mr. Helvering. I have no desire to enter into any factional controversy which may exist in the State of Kansas, but it is well for the Members of the Senate to know something about the motive that is behind this organized effort to destroy a man because they have not been able to control him.

Now, what are the facts? They brought here a man named Lamb, who had been appointed as acting postmaster in Manhattan, Kans., on the recommendation of Mr. Helvering while he was in the House of Representatives and while he was the referee, as we understand the term here, of the Post Office Department with reference to postmasterships. From time immemorial it has been customary for the Post Office Department to accept the recommendation of the Members of Congress of the same political faith as the administration in power for post-office appointments in their districts. It is not an invariable rule that the persons thus recommended are appointed, but the recommendations are persuasive, because Members of Congress are supposed to know more about the men and women in their districts than any Postmaster General could possibly know.

While Mr. Helvering was still a Member of Congress, it seems that he recommended the appointment of a man by the name of Lamb as postmaster of Manhattan, Kans. The nomination was not confirmed because there was at that time, as will be recalled, after the election in 1918 a majority of Republicans in the Senate, and they refused to confirm any nominations sent in by Woodrow Wilson at the short session of Congress in 1918. As the result this man's nomination was not confirmed. In the meantime Mr. Helvering went out of Congress, and the question of Lamb's further appointment came up while Mr. Helvering was not any longer in Congress and had nothing more to do with it. There was some correspondence with reference to this appointment between him and another member of the Kansas delegation, who, I think, at that time was the only Democrat from that State. The outcome of it was that Lamb was appointed for the 4-year term, and he served out his unexpired term as postmaster in Manhattan, Kans.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. The Senator will recall, as evidence of the character of Mr. Lamb, the star witness of the Senator from Delaware, that Mr. Lamb on cross-examination was asked if he had ever had any trouble with Mr. Helvering, and he replied that he had never exactly had trouble but had had some misunderstanding with him. Being pressed further as to the misunderstanding he had had with Mr. Helvering he testified that his first acquaintance with Mr. Helvering was in 1914, when he went to see Mr. Helvering to try to borrow $1,200 from him, although he had never before met him, for the purpose of starting a newspaper, and that when Mr. Helvering refused to loan it to him he proceeded to get mad with Mr. Helvering because the latter did not want to be "shaken down" for $1,200 by an entire stranger.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is the type of denunciations that have been brought here to destroy this man's character. They dug up in the Post Office Department a letter written, it is claimed, by this man Lamb in which he referred to a letter from or conversations with a man named Cassell, who is alleged to have said that in order to get the permanent appointment Lamb would have to put up a thousand dollars. Based upon that letter there was an investigation made by a post-office inspector. The post-office inspector went to Cassell, took his affidavit, and filed it in the Department. In that affidavit Cassell absolutely denied that any such conversations had occurred or any such letter had ever been written, and that reply and that affidavit of the man upon whom this investigation was based has disappeared from the records of the Post Office Department. In view of that fact I say it was entirely proper to bring Mr. Cassell himself here to testify under oath before the Finance Committee.

When he did so he said he never had any such conversation and never made any such representation; that when he found out that this man Lamb had made an affidavit claiming that he ever did that he denounced him to his face and called him a "dirty sucker"; and that he never had spoken to him from that day to this. That is the kind of testimony upon which we are asked to condemn Mr. Helvering, and those are the tactics that have been resorted to here.

The Senator from Delaware has been busy in exploiting the letter of Lamb and the affidavit of Lamb charging Helvering with some sort of misconduct in the distribution of post offices, but he has deliberately refused to refer from the very beginning until this hour to the testimony of Cassell, who denies it, and says that his affidavit was filed in the Post Office Department, an affidavit that we have been unable to find and to which the Senator from Delaware has never even referred.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Delaware?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I distinctly stated in the minority report and I again stated to the Senate that Cassell denied the allegation. I want to ask the Senator this question: He saw a copy of the letter which Lamb wrote to the Post Office Department, and I want to know whether, as a member of the committee, he does not agree or would not have agreed if he had been asked that it was important enough to bring this witness to Washington in view of that letter?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is exactly what I started to do until the Senator stopped me, as I indicated in the early part of my remarks. Of course, the letter filed in the Post Office Department was of sufficient seriousness to justify the Department in making an investigation; but what I complain of is that the Senator from Delaware has either suppressed or not referred to any evidence in behalf of Mr. Helvering that was adduced in that investigation to show that he was entirely innocent of the charge made against him by Lamb and the testimony given by Mr. Cassel in the Post Office Department and given before the committee.

Mr. HASTINGS. I have just said that it will be found in the minority report, and that I stated to the Senate that when Cassell came before the committee he definitely and positively denied anything of the kind.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have listened to the Senator very carefully, and I have not heard him refer in his remarks to the denial made by Mr. Cassell of every statement made by Lamb upon which investigation was based and conducted.

Mr. President, of course there has been all sorts of gossip about the way Mr. Helvering conducted the highway department. Reference has been made to the fact that the legislature authorized an investigation of the Highway Department of Kansas. That was given here as a reason why we ought not to confirm him. The Legislature of Kansas that convened in January 1931 did adopt a resolution to investigate that department. It was a Republican legislature. The previous administration had been Republican. The legislature adopted a resolution providing for an investigation of the highway department under Governor Woodring's predecessor. Governor Woodring vetoed the resolution on the ground that it was a useless expenditure, and then by executive order he directed that an audit be made of the Highway Department of Kansas.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time of the Senator from Kentucky has expired.

Mr. BARKLEY. I ask unanimous consent that I may use now 5 minutes of the time which will be awarded to me by the Senator from Delaware.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, permission is granted.

Mr. BARKLEY. It is agreed that I shall have the closing of the argument, and I will take 5 minutes of that time now.

Mr. President, the session of the Kansas Legislature has just adjourned. A week or two ago it adopted a resolution to investigate the highway department regardless of politics. That is a resolution which seems to be customary and entirely proper in the Legislature of Kansas, providing for a general audit. That is what it amounts to. That audit is in process of being made now. Certainly it is no evidence against Mr. Helvering because the legislature has adopted a resolution to audit all the funds of the highway department under all administrations since the highway department was established in the State of Kansas.

There is not a thing in the record, there is not an insinuation that has been borne out by proof, there is not an innuendo that has not fallen of its own weight, there is not a reason nor an excuse that can be offered against the confirmation of this man to the position for which he has been selected by the President of the United States. Whether the President might have found an abler man, a man better qualified for the position, is not for me to say. Whether the people of my State could have found a better Senator to send here in my place, whether the people of Delaware could have found a better man to send here than the present senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS], whether all of the States might not find better representatives for this body than we are, is a matter about which many people will have honest differences of opinion.

But, Mr. President, we need not speculate about what the President might have done under some different circumstances. He has nominated an honorable, an able, a conscientious, an honest man; and I sincerely hope that Senators on their oaths, on their consciences, without regard to politics, will give this man justice, will deal fairly by him, as he has a right to ask that we deal by him and as we would want to be dealt by if we were in his position under the same circumstances that have been presented here.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, as a member of the Finance Committee, in an executive session of that committee I moved that the President be requested to withdraw the nomination of Mr. Helvering. That motion was rejected by the committee. Later the question of confirmation was voted upon by the committee, and I voted against the confirmation of the nominee. My constituents have a right to know my reasons for my action in the Committee on Finance and for my vote in the Senate.

With much that has been said in connection with this case I am not in sympathy. Some of the charges are in my opinion baseless. Some of the allegations have been exaggerated. I have reached my conclusion after giving the most conscientious consideration to the whole case of which I am capable. I do not mind saying to my colleagues that the one thought that dominated me during the whole hearing was this: If a Republican President had submitted this nomination, what course would I take? Again and again I reached the conclusion that I would unhesitatingly and militantly oppose confirmation. I do not feel that I can take any other course because it so happens that the nomination is made by one whom I am most desirous of serving loyally.

Mr. President, we have before us the question of the confirmation of the President's appointee for the office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue. This position in importance is second only to that of the Secretary of the Treasury as far as the fiscal operations of our Government are concerned.

The Commissioner of Internal Revenue is in direct charge and control of the collection of all of our Federal revenues except customs. Through the agents he appoints, he deals directly with every American taxpayer. The discipline, ethics, and standard of efficiency of thousands of employees are influenced by his leadership. I submit that whatever the standards should be with respect to the past business conduct and associations of ordinary Government officials, the highest standard should be required in the case of a man who is to handle several billion dollars of taxes annually. I submit that whatever other qualifications for this position may be required, the highest integrity and an unblemished record are of first importance.

The record of this nominee has been the subject of searching inquiry by the Senate Finance Committee. This inquiry assumed special importance because of the fact that some of the charges brought against him dealt directly with the Bureau of the Government which it is now proposed he is to head.

It is not my purpose to take the time of the Senate to rehearse these charges. They are set forth in the record of the hearings which are on the desk of every Senator, and they have been discussed already at length in this Chamber. It is no more than fair to observe that, as inevitably happens in such cases, the charges are disputed, the facts contradicted, and the appointee warmly defended by his friends.

We are not called upon here today to sit in trial upon Mr. Helvering. It is true that the confirmation of his appointment at our hands may be taken to be our finding that the charges are baseless for, assuredly, if we had a contrary view of the matter, the confirmation of his appointment would be unthinkable. On the other hand, I recognize that if we refuse confirmation, it may be said that we have, in effect, sustained the charges which have been preferred against him and of which he protests his entire innocence. This aspect is always troublesome and embarrassing.

Our first and paramount duty, however, is to shape our course in the public interest. Will the public good be served by placing in office at the head of the Bureau of Internal Revenue a man whose dealings with the Bureau have been challenged and concerning which suspicions have been created which will persist irrespective of what we do?

I have considered carefully all of the evidence pro and con adduced at the hearings. Inevitably it creates doubts. How, I inquire, should these doubts be resolved except on the side of the public interest? I had hoped that the nomination might be withdrawn, but since this has not been done, every Member of the Senate has a responsibility which he cannot shirk. I am prepared to assume mine even if I stand alone.

The confirmation of a Presidential appointee is no empty ceremony. The constitutional purpose of requiring senatorial confirmation was to put squarely upon the Members of the Senate the responsibility for the character of the men who, in appointive offices, are to operate our Government. Mindful of this responsibility, and with great personal regret, I feel constrained to vote against the confirmation of Mr. Helvering. Had this nomination been made by a Republican President, I would not have the slightest hesitancy in voting against confirmation. I cannot permit my most earnest desire to support the President to lead me to reverse my judgment.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, it is always a matter of great concern to me to have one of my colleagues charge me with unfair conduct or to have one say anything about me that reflects upon me personally. As I sat here and heard the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] and the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] defend this nomination I wondered how it was possible for anybody to get any other impression than that I am the person on trial in this matter. The Senator from Missouri, in a rather sarcastic vein, referred to me as "the distinguished former judge of the police court of the city of Wilmington." I want to say to him now, if he intended that as a reflection upon me, that in all my career as a public servant that job stands out as the one of which I am the most proud, because it gave me the greatest possible opportunity to deal with people who needed help. I took the appointment at the request of my colleague who was Governor of the State at that time and because he believed I could do a good job. Prior to that time, and when I was 34 years of age, I had been made a judge of the highest court of my State for a period of 12 years. In my judgment, I could very well afford to take the judgeship of the police court without it doing any injury to me in the future. I hope it will not do me any harm here, even with the Senator from Missouri.

The Senator referred to Mr. Lucas, who was Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and referred to that twice today as being one of the jobs for which I was responsible. I had nothing to do with it. I was not in the Senate at the time. I was not consulted, and did not know Lucas until long after he was named for that particular position.

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] made a statement with respect to this matter, and such a statement that it aroused the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to comment upon it. What was it?

In the committee, when it was decided that a subcommittee should be appointed, we were given a period of 7 days in which to make an examination and report back to the full committee. The Senator from Kentucky is wrong in saying that he hunted up these witnesses. I went to Mr. Irey, the man who I understood had this report, and who was an investigator, and I asked Mr. Irey to find those witnesses. The particular witness that I was trying to get before the committee was Henry, because Henry made a statement directly opposed to that which Helvering had made to the committee; namely, that that firm had a definite agreement with Helvering about their fees, while Helvering gave the committee the impression that he got straight fees, and then this auditing firm rendered reports to him as to the amount of expenses for auditing, and so forth. So from my point of view it was important to call that one witness in order to clear up that point; and I pointed out to the Senator from Kentucky where Henry had testified to this. I gave him the report. I gave him, at his request, all the reports I had, and pointed out to him where he could get this information. He took the report, took it to Mr. Helvering, and Helvering came back and admitted that what Henry said was true, and that he was mistaken when he said there was no such agreement.

Edgecomb was in California; and my recollection is that this was about Thursday of that week, and we had to make a report by the following Tuesday, and I did not suppose it was possible to get Edgecomb here in time to testify before the committee. But may I inquire of the Senator from Kentucky how it happens that it is my responsibility to find out about these witnesses instead of his, when he is the chairman of the committee?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Delaware was acting in the capacity of prosecuting attorney in this case; and at the moment when I was preparing to have these men summoned to Washington, as I said a while ago, the Senator came over on this side and advised me that it would not be necessary under the circumstances, and we abandoned the idea. What I complained of a while ago was that when we got into the full committee, after that, the Senator complained of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD] and myself because we had not summoned these witnesses.

Mr. HASTINGS. Here is the report; and I ask any fair Senator here to read it and see whether the Senator from Kentucky is justified in his criticism of my conduct.

Mr. BARKLEY. I will say that the committee felt so, and that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. BYRD], who was my colleague on the committee, felt so, and other members of the committee felt so after the Senator from Delaware had read that to them.

Mr. HASTINGS. Well, whatever the Senator from Kentucky felt about it, when he said something about it before the committee I distinctly stated that it was not my purpose to criticize my colleagues upon the committee; but here is what happened:

Mr. Helvering came before the subcommittee and made another statement, and he made statements wholly different from that which he made to the committee before. Thereupon it became necessary to get these other witnesses—Washington and all the rest of them—and I am not certain it was not the Senator from Kentucky who then moved that this nomination be approved without an opportunity, even that late, to get Edgecomb and these other witnesses here.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. As chairman of the subcommittee, I made the report of the subcommittee to the full committee recommending that a favorable report be made on Mr. Helvering. After a discussion of the matter further, and after the Senator from Delaware had, by innuendo at least, criticized us for not bringing these witnesses, we voted unanimously to bring them.

Mr. HASTINGS. The Senator from Kentucky has constantly asserted that I brought forth suddenly these reports from the Treasury Department and confronted Mr. Helvering with them. What actually happened was this: I went before the committee with these reports, and I read to the committee the reports; and it was suggested that Helvering ought to be in there, and he ought to be heard. I insisted, then, that we ought to appoint a subcommittee to consider this matter, that it ought not to be done offhand; so that the Senator from Kenutcky and the Senator from Missouri and all other Senators were fully aware of what was in those reports, or at least the important parts that I read to them. It was the committee that called in Mr. Helvering. It was the committee that directed that I proceed to examine him, and I did examine him; and now the Senator from Kentucky complains of me because, in my examination of Mr. Helvering, I appeared, as he puts it, as a prosecuting attorney.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware further yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I agree that it is true that the Senator, before the full committee, started in reading this report without Mr. Helvering's presence—a report that he had never seen or heard of, whose existence he knew nothing about—and some of us did insist that, as a matter of fairness to Mr. Helvering, he should be called in, in order that he might hear whatever complaint or criticism the Senator might have to make against him; and that was done.

Mr. HASTINGS. I distinctly stated to the committee that what I was doing was wholly preliminary. I have always insisted that, whenever we were making a record of it, Helvering ought to be present.

No; here is what happened:

The Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Kentucky are taking the course that is usually taken when a man has no case. The truth is that these charges cannot be answered; and it is undertaken to answer them by abuse of counsel on the other side, as the saying is. It is undertaken to answer them by having attention directed to the Senator from Deleware in an effort to make the country believe that a fair chance was not given this man to defend himself before the committee.

So far as I know, not a single witness was brought before the committee that I did not request to come there. The Senator from Missouri and the Senator from Kentucky both say that Lamb was the chief witness of the Senator from Delaware; that Lamb was his prize witness. I had no prize witness at all. I called the witnesses that the record indicated ought to be called before a committee that was anxious to find the truth. That is what I did. I called them, and I called them before the committee without ever having seen them. I called Cassell, and I called Pratt, and all the others, and examined them without ever having seen them. But what happened on the other side?

When Washington came here, where did he go? He went to the Washington Hotel, where Helvering was; and it was Helvering who went over with the committee these various matters that were put before them.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The evidence shows that after the Senator himself had cross-examined, or had sought to tangle up Mr. Helvering as to his recollection about his fees in 2 or 3 cases, he tried in every way to find whether he had any records. He talked to everybody who had anything to do with him in connection with these two cases. He tried to locate Mr. Washington by long-distance telephone to find whether he had any records that would shed any light on the matter. He never was able to find Mr. Washington over the telephone; but Mr. Washington learned that he had been looking for him, or had been inquiring about him, and went to Mr. Helvering's room of his own accord, and without any request from Mr. Helvering.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. President, I do not care to reply to the Senator. He has used expressions about me and about these reports to the effect that I "pulled" them on the nominee, indicating that I was doing something that was not fair, and has said other things with respect to this testimony; and in the Trapshooters case, if you please, he does what? He says that in the Trapshooters case no injustice was done the Government!

I never charged that any injustice was done the Government. I said definitely and distinctly yesterday that I would have no particular charge against Helvering with respect to the Slim Jim Co. case if he had stuck to one story the first day and the second day and the other days that he appeared before the committee. But what did he do? He gave to the chairman of the committee the distinct impression that the Slim Jim Co. case was settled by him for an amount of $459,000, some $800,000 less than the amount that had been fixed, because a fraud had been practiced upon him by his friend Washington with associates of that company—that is what he told the chairman of the committee, and that is what he told the full committee—and they did it by padding the returns. He said it more than once. He said it twice.

In the next place, he came before the subcommittee, and what did he say there? He said not what the Senator from Kentucky says he said, but he said there not only that this case was settled by him under section 210 but he gave the distinct impression that it was fully settled under section 210; and he left the impression with the committee that the final amount of money paid in that settlement of $459,000 was under section 210. It was only afterward, when I was prodding him about his statement that these men padded the books, that he said that 2 years later he went before the department, and there he discovered for the first time that they had not settled the case under section 210. It is his contradictory statements all through with respect to the Slim Jim case that in my judgment make this nominee unfit for this position; and with respect to the Trapshooters Oil Co. case, in my judgment, the evidence shows complete fraud on his part with a client.

Here is a lawyer who had been practicing law for some time and had a high education. He practiced law up until 1912. He served in the Congress for 6 years; and then, when his client came to him, what did he tell him? He said, "We made a contract in Kansas which we cannot live up to because it is necessary to have a New York engineer and we will have to pay him $10,000." Talk about his forgetting it! He went into details as to why it was necessary to have an engineer. In answer to my question whether any physical examination was made, he stated positively that a physical examination was made. All of that is what he said about that case, when he knew at that time, and he knew when he testified here, that no physical examination was made, no engineer was employed, and that they got the sum of $18,000 instead of the sum of $10,000 that he says was originally paid to him in that case.

That is the kind of testimony that you are asked to believe here with a man appointed to a position like this.

So far as I am concerned, I do not care anything about this case. As I said yesterday in response to the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], who said that I was against Mr. Helvering because he was the chairman of the Democratic State committee, I never knew that Mr. Helvering was chairman of the Democratic State committee until I heard the statement made by him while he was before the committee. I assumed that he was a Democrat. I have no complaint to make about that. I assumed that this administration wanted a man in that place in whom they had confidence. As I view this record, however, I doubt very much whether the President, if he could look at the matter again, could believe positively that he could have such confidence in this man as would warrant him in placing him in that position if he had it to do again.

Oh, yes; the Senator charges me, and he even charges the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], with being prejudiced in this case. Of course, I knew he would charge me with political prejudice; but they have already said that they did not charge the Senator from Michigan with political prejudice. Well, what kind of prejudice do you charge us with? You know we have done nothing more than it is our duty to do as members of the committee and Members of the Senate. That is all I have sought to do. You are entitled to have a Democrat appointed; but, for God's sake, go and get one in whom the people of this country will have confidence, and do not force this man upon the Senate and upon the Nation.

That is what I ask you, as the majority party, to do; and I warn you that if you do not do it, this man's record shows that probably you will be sorry, too, in the years to come.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in view of the fact that the last speech of the Senator from Delaware was a reiteration of his first speech, and that there is nothing new in it to which there is any necessity for making a reply, I have no further remarks to make.

I make the point of no quorum, in order that we may have a full vote when the roll is called.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Copeland	La Follette	Robinson, Ind.
Ashurst	Couzens	Lewis	Russell
Austin	Cutting	Logan	Schall

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the following Senators are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business: The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], the Senator from Illinois [Mr. DIETERICH], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-one Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. BARKLEY (at 2 o'clock and 50 minutes p.m.). Mr. President, there is to be no further discussion, and we might as well vote now.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The agreement was that the vote should be taken at 3 o'clock. The only question in the mind of the Chair is that some Senator who knew of the agreement might not be here until 3 o'clock, and the Chair thinks perhaps we should wait until 3 o'clock. If the Senate desires to vote, that is all right.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, it was I who proposed the unanimous-consent agreement that we vote at 3 o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator is correct.

Mr. McNARY. I think it would be unfair to vote earlier than that hour, because some Senator might have noted the agreement in the RECORD and be depending on our voting at 3 o'clock. It would take unanimous consent, and I shall object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection is made.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, only a few moments are left before 3 o'clock, and I shall say a word.

Not being a member of the Committee on Finance no opportunity has been afforded me of hearing the testimony of the witnesses relating to the controversy over the nomination of Mr. Helvering to be Commissioner of Internal Revenue.

In view of the statements made by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS] that he looked at the eyes of Mr. Helvering and did not like them, that he thought they were shifty, and that he was basing his judgment in this case, not on the testimony, but on general considerations which he thought he had a right to have in mind as to the character and qualifications of the nominee, I feel justified in saying that it has been my privilege to know Mr. Helvering for a good many years. During the period of my acquaintance with him there has been occasion to observe his conduct both as a citizen and as a public official, and I have no hesitancy in saying that, so far as my judgment goes, he measures up to the very highest standards.

It is an act of injustice, in my opinion, for Senators disclaiming political motives, and implying a superior recognition of public duty, to yield themselves to prejudices which cannot be justified in evidence. There have been occasions within the knowledge of every Member of this body when efforts have been made to detract from the character and honor of citizens and of public officials. If the Senate wishes to lend itself to that form of procedure, it now has an opportunity of doing so. In the testimony and in the able and unanswerable argument of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] we have ample justification for the confirmation of this nomination.

It is both unfair and unjust, when a committee of the Senate has heard all evidence offered touching the qualifications and fitness of an appointee to office, to go outside of the record and reach a decision on prejudice; and it does not reflect credit, in my humble judgment, on those who profess themselves to be possessors of virtues superior to ordinary citizens.

The fair, just, and honorable thing to do is to try any case on the evidence. Every man in this country is entitled to the application of that rule. You can arouse suspicion, you can hear rumors, you can lend yourself to the defamation of the best character known to the human mind. A sense of justice, that sense of justice which should inspire all Senators, should compel them to decide issues of this nature fairly; compel them to respond to the natural and logical conclusions to be arrived at from the evidence. Lawyers are listening to me now who know that if their fitness for office were to be determined by the justice of the causes which they have presented to juries or courts they could not stand the test anywhere.

The question is, Does this record show the nominee to be unfit; does it show him to be dishonorable? If any Senator reaches his conclusion to that effect from the evidence, I would never, here or anywhere else, criticize his judgment. But when he admits that he is going outside the evidence and deciding on the color of the eyes, or the shift of the eyes, I say it is time to call a halt, and reach a conclusion according to the evidence. Whatever decision the Senate reaches will be a just conclusion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour of 3 o'clock having arrived, under the agreement heretofore entered into, the question before the Senate is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination of Guy T. Helvering to be Commissioner of Internal Revenue? The yeas and nays having been ordered, the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LEWIS (when Mr. BARBOUR'S name was called). I am requested to state that a general pair has been arranged between the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] and the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR]. I make the announcement for the RECORD; I know nothing as to the details of how these Senators would vote.

Mrs. CARAWAY (when her name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], who is absent. Not knowing how he would vote, if present, I withhold my vote.

Mr. LEWIS (when Mr. DIETERICH'S name was called). I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. DIETERICH] is absent on official business. He is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES]. I announce for my colleague that, if present, his vote would be "yea."

Mr. LEWIS (when Mr. HEBERT'S name was called). I am requested to announce the pair of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT] with myself. If the Senator from Rhode Island were present, he would vote "nay", and were I privileged to vote I should vote "yea."

Mr. LEWIS (when his name was called). Having announced my pair with the Senator from Rhode Island, I withhold my vote, announcing again that, if privileged to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], who is absent. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. LEWIS (when Mr. PITTMAN'S name was called). I am requested to announce the absence of the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] on official business. He is paired with the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN]. Were the Senator from Nevada present, it is announced he would vote "yea", and the Senator from New Jersey, if present, would vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS]. In his absence, and not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. AUSTIN (after having voted in the negative). Since voting I have learned that the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], with whom I have a general pair, is in a conference and cannot attend the Senate at the present time, but that, if present, he would vote "yea." I therefore withdraw my vote.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the following Senators are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business:

The Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS], and the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER].

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT—NOMINATION OF SENATOR BRATTON AS CIRCUIT JUDGE

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, the President of the United States has honored one of the Members of the United States Senate, Hon. SAM GILBERT BRATTON, now a Senator from New Mexico, by nominating him to be a United States circuit judge for the tenth circuit.

I am sure that the Committee on the Judiciary, if this nomination were referred to it, could ascertain no new facts respecting the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON]; and, therefore, without any eulogy of his merits and talents as a lawyer and a Senator, I am going to presume to ask unanimous consent that the generous and courteous custom applied when Members of this body are appointed to the bench shall be now observed, and that the nomination be considered at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, on account of the very many charming qualities of the Senator from New Mexico, whose nomination we have received, in behalf of the minority I join in the request made by the able Senator from Arizona.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. No objection being heard, the clerk will read the message from the President.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

I nominate Sam Gilbert Bratton, of New Mexico, to be United States circuit judge, tenth circuit, to succeed John H. Cotteral, deceased.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is, Will the Senate advise and consent to the nomination?

The nomination was unanimously confirmed.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I move that the President be notified of the confirmation.

The motion was unanimously agreed to.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will state the next nomination on the calendar.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Thomas Hewes, of Connecticut, to be Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, this is another nomination for a position in the Treasury Department that was reported from the Finance Committee without ever having the nominee appear to be questioned. I do not know of this man's qualifications; I am not in a position to disclose anything which would indicate that he is not competent or fit for the office. However, the Chairman of the Committee on Finance promised me that he would have Mr. Hewes come before the committee before the nomination was taken up. I now ask the Chairman of the Committee on Finance whether or not he is going to give us an opportunity to examine Mr. Hewes or whether it is proposed to railroad this nomination through?

Mr. HARRISON. I may say that the Senator did request, I think, some 4 days ago, that Mr. Hewes be brought here to be questioned.

Mr. COUZENS. That is correct.

Mr. HARRISON. I spoke to the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN] and asked him to try to get Mr. Hewes to come here. I was told that he could not get here for a few days but would send certain information, and I had hoped that the matter would be straightened out. If, however, the Senator from Michigan insists on the nominee coming down, in view of what I told him, I think the nominee ought to appear before the committee.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, I should like the Senator to do that, because I have a bundle of information here, and I do not like to put it all in the RECORD without giving the nominee a chance to be heard.

Mr. HARRISON. I thank the Senator. I ask that this nomination be passed over for the present, and we will try to have Mr. Hewes come here.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination will be passed over. The next nomination on the calendar will be stated.

THE JUDICIARY

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of James R. Fleming, of Indiana, to be United States attorney for the northern district of Indiana.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Val Nolan, of Indiana, to be United States attorney for the southern district of Indiana.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

That completes the calendar.

REPORT OF COMMITTEES

LEGISLATIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate resume legislative session.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Chaffee, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed a bill (H.R. 5790) to provide for organizations within the Farm Credit Administration to make loans for the production and marketing of agricultural products, to amend the Federal Farm Loan Act, to amend the Agricultural Marketing Act, to provide a market for obligations of the United States, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled joint resolution (S.J.Res. 48) authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point, Posheng Yen, a citizen of China, and it was signed by the Vice President.

APRIL REPORT OF RECONSTRUCTION FINANCE CORPORATION

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter from the Chairman of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, submitting, pursuant to law, the report of the activities and expenditures of the Corporation for April 1933, together with a statement of loans authorized during that month, showing the name, amount, and rate of interest in each case, which, with the accompanying statements, was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Twenty-sixth Annual Congress of the Descendants of the Signers of the Declaration of Independence, affirming its opposition to the recognition of the present Soviet Government of Russia, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the aldermen of the city of Chelsea, Mass., protesting against the reported suspension of repair work at the Charlestown Navy Yard until 1935, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. BULKLEY presented the following joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Ohio, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

Joint resolution memorializing the Senate of the United States of America to act favorably and promptly upon the three World Court treaties which are now upon its Executive Calendar

Whereas the Ohio Senate on February 10, 1925, called upon the Senate of the United States "to act favorably and promptly on the proposal for American adherence to the world court"; and

Whereas the Senate of the United States on January 27, 1926, by a vote of 76 to 17, approved the adherence of the United States to the World Court, with five reservations; and

Whereas these reservations are now fully met in the judgment of the Department of State and of such authoritative bodies as the American Bar Association and the Ohio State Bar Association by the three treaties now awaiting the Senate's consent to ratification; and

Whereas the completion of the adherence of this country to the World Court as the outstanding agency for the judicial settlement of certain classes of international disputes would contribute to that sense of international security of which the nations of the earth now stand so much in need; and

Whereas the question of our adherence to the Court has now been before the country and the Senate in some form for 10 years and is, in our judgment, entitled now to settlement on the merits: Therefore be it

Resolved by the General Assembly of the State of Ohio, That the members of the General Assembly of the State of Ohio hereby memorialize the Senate of the United States to act favorably and promptly upon the three World Court treaties which are now upon its Executive Calendar; and be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to each of the two United States Senators from Ohio.

REMONETIZATION OF SILVER

Mr. WHEELER presented resolutions adopted by Glentana Local, No. 334, Farmers Union, of Glentana, Mont., which were referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(Unanimously approved by Glentana Local, No. 334)

Whereas the Federal Reserve Banking System, owned and controlled by private money lenders and users, is a debt-making financial system that has bankrupted the Nation and its people, creating crimes, suicides, and insanity; now imperiling the functioning of our Government, and has placed a yoke of bondage on the people of the United States; and

Whereas, under powers granted to Congress, the Constitution provides in article I, section 5, that Congress shall have power to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin:

Therefore the Federal Reserve banking laws are unconstitutional, and have sunk this Nation in despair and left it torn and bleeding: Therefore be it

Resolved, That we demand the repeal of this hell-born financial system, that the Federal Reserve Act be abolished. The United States Government issue non-interest-bearing Treasury notes, and never again be guilty of the crime of issuing interest-bearing bonds; and be it further

Resolved, That the crime of 1873 be atoned for and that Congress immediately enact the Wheeler silver bill (S. 70) remonetizing silver; and be it further

Resolved, That as a further measure to end this crazy criminal banker-made depression that Congress immediately enact the Frazier farmers' farm relief bill (S. 457) and immediately pay the soldiers' bonus with non-interest-bearing Treasury notes. Such notes to be full legal tender for all debts, public and private, omitting any reference to any Federal Reserve bank or banker as provided for in H.R. 7726; and be it further

Resolved, That Senator WHEELER be asked to insert it in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

FRANK SCHUSTER, President,
JOHN ZIMMER, Secretary,
Farmers' Union, Glentana, Mont.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR CLARK AT MARSHALL COLLEGE, HUNTINGTON, W.VA.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an able and interesting address delivered by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] at the commencement exercises at Marshall College, Huntington, W.Va., on Monday, May 29, 1933.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

President Shawkey, members of the faculty, and student body of Marshall College, ladies, and gentlemen, let me say at the outset that this is a day which brings to my heart and mind feelings for which I have no adequate words of expression. The honor which I feel at being invited to deliver the commencement address at this historic institution and the extraordinary gratification which must inevitably come to me at being awarded by the faculty the honorary degree of doctor of laws—both of which, I assure you, I keenly appreciate—are merged and submerged in the overwhelming feeling of pleasure in being allowed to stand today in the haunts where my father stood when as a young man of 23 he succeeded, at Marshall College, President Morrow, the distinguished father of the late Senator Dwight F. Morrow.

My father during the course of his life received many high honors, but none which he treasured more, of which he was more proud, than that of having been in his young manhood the president of Marshall College. For many years he retained the distinction of having been the youngest college president in the United States. His children were raised to appraise that honor as one of the highest that was ever bestowed upon him throughout his life.

Nearly 22 years ago, on the occasion of his last visit to Huntington, I had the pleasure of being with him when from the rostrum in this college he publicly expressed his pride in his connection with it and his undying affection for the institution. And so, while I have been in Huntington only once before in my life, I am certain that you will all understand why, in a very real sense, I have a feeling of coming home to be at Marshall College today. For after all, when all is said and done, nothing can possibly afford a normal man more pleasure than to "View the same scenes,

And drink the same streams
And to run the same course
That his fathers have run."

So today I feel that I am no stranger to these walls, and I know that my father, if he might be here today to see the splendid progress of the institution whose growth he fostered so many years ago, would rejoice as doth the upright in heart.

It is difficult for public men, in making commencement addresses, to avoid banality, on the one hand, and argumentation, on the other. Every reasonable citizen entertains such sincere feelings of congratulation and good wishes for the young men and women who have been fortunate enough to complete a college education that nearly everything which may be said in that regard has become worn and frayed from previous usage to an extent where commencement addresses have by tradition become conventional and tiresome. On the other hand, there is the constant temptation on such an occasion to a man in public life to undertake to expound his own theorem, with the idea that he may be able to make converts among those newly coming to the more active phases of our national life for the particular theories to which he himself adheres.

Therefore, today, graduates of Marshall College, I shall endeavor to avoid both precept and propaganda. I shall remind you only of a few things which you yourselves do know, if you have been as admirably trained for the battles of life as I am sure you have, and I shall endeavor to endear myself to your hearts and write my name on the tablets of your memory by making these remarks mercifully brief.

The young men and women who graduate from the colleges and universities of the United States this spring are coming into the activities of the world to face unparalleled conditions. Measures are in progress which bid fair to radically, probably permanently, change the whole of our governmental, economic, and social fabric. The classes which left the colleges of the North and South in 1861 to don the blue or the gray, as the case might be, the young lads who as members of the Cadet Corps of Virginia Military Institute met the embattled Union hosts at Newmarket, the numberless youths who left school as mere boys in 1917 to become stern-faced men in the Argonne and Saint-Mihiel, all embarked upon enterprises calling to the patriotism and calculated to stir the blood of men harking back to long generations of martial sires. You leave these cloistered halls in times of even sterner stress.

Never in the history of the United States, never in the history of the world, has there been a time when there was more vital necessity for the active participation in public affairs of men and women of trained intelligence than exists today. The world is in a welter of depression and despair. For this reinforcement of progressive thought and action, we must look primarily to those who have had the advantages of a college education, who, fortunate above their fellows, have been privileged to enjoy the opportunity to study questions of public import, and who owe an obligation to their country—and more particularly to those whose sacrifices made their advantages possible, to live up to the full requirements of citizenship.

There was a time not so long ago when in the full tide of a pseudo-prosperity in this country, there was almost a cult among the intelligent and the well-to-do that it was a disgrace to take an interest in politics—or in public affairs because that is all that politics is. In the recent election, the tremendous increase in the popular vote showed a sudden and overwhelming return to realization upon the part of the great mass of the people that politics is, after all, nothing more than business—your business, my business, the business of all of us. Indeed, in these parlous times it is about the only business left to millions of our citizens.

I urge upon you, as among those who have enjoyed exceptional advantages in life, that there is no higher obligation of citizenship than that of participating actively in public affairs. Not that I urge you to run for public office—that is a poor enough business when you are successful and it is an infinitely sorry business when you lose—but the highest hope for the Nation's welfare is for an intelligent electorate to study the public questions of the day and for every qualified voter to go to the polls on election day and vote his honest convictions, no matter what they may be. To the failure of decent citizens to properly study public questions and then enforce their sovereign will at the polls, all our municipal disgraces and nearly all our State and National difficulties are directly chargeable.

There does not exist in the whole United States a city or hamlet where decent, law-abiding citizens do not far outnumber the racketeers, the criminals, and the corrupt. These sinister elements exist only through the neglect of the decent majority to adequately enforce its will through government. If I had my way, I would have every State provide by law that any citizen who failed without proper reason to exercise the right of suffrage should be deprived of that right for a specified period. My most fervent prayer for the future of this Republic is that the time may come when every citizen may have the intelligence to cast his vote and the courage to cast it as he pleases, regardless of every boss, file leader, and whip cracker in the land.

I do not desire today to discuss in any way our domestic, political, and economic problems, for anything that I might say in that regard might smack of partisanship. But I do wish to invite your attention briefly to a subject so vital in its possibilities, so dread in its implications as to challenge the interest of every thinking man or woman in this Nation, or for that matter, in the whole world, and that is the imperative necessity for a cessation in the race of competitive armaments which is bankrupting the world and for the establishment of permanent peace through disarmament. To my mind, President Roosevelt's most magnificent achievement has been his stirring and dramatic appeal to the nations of the world to avoid the dangers of new and more terrible conflicts through the medium of universal and pro-rata disarmament. It is of supreme importance that there be created in this country an overwhelming public sentiment in support of this endeavor. Backed by this sentiment in our own country, the President will be immensely strengthened in his dealings with other nations.

Almost 20 years ago the world was shaken by the tragic cataclysm of the World War. It is not necessary to speak of the horrors of that dreadful calamity—of the millions of lives that were sacrificed, of the oceans of blood that were poured out, of the billions of treasure that were sacrificed, of the moral and governmental deterioration that accompanied and followed the awful conflict. We all know that story. Today the world is still reeling and suffering from the effects of the struggle. The world is still paying the price in the breaking down of governments, in revolution, dictatorships, depression, panic, and famine. If civilization is to endure, this ordeal must not be repeated. Yet in the midst of world-wide desolation the nations of the world are persistently arming for the next conflict. To say nothing of the perils to civilization in such a course, in this time of universal stress it constitutes the most shocking and indefensible economic waste in history.

We are a creditor Nation. Most of the nations of Europe are heavily in our debt, owing us billions which they now profess themselves unable to pay. Complex as is the problem of the interallied debts in many respects, its general outlines may be simply stated and easily understood. During the Great War and after its conclusion the United States loaned to the allied and associated nations vast sums of money—money so vitally needed that without it these nations would have been unable to continue their prosecution of the war. These loans in the aggregate exceeded the sum of $21,000,0000,000—a sum so vast as almost to pass the comprehension of the human mind.

These sums the United States did not have on hand in the Treasury as surplus but were borrowed from the people of the United States upon the solemn obligations of our Government.

These loans must be repaid, dollar for dollar, punctually upon the date due according to the tenor of the obligation. And since the United States has no means of revenue except from the taxation of our own citizens and of property within the United States, it follows that except as these loans to foreign nations are repaid by the debtor nations the whole tremendous burden of the loans must be shouldered by the taxpayers of this country. A very large portion of the burden of taxation under which the Nation has been struggling is due directly to this cause.

We may assume that the debts were contracted by the Allies in good faith. Certainly their need was great at the time the debts were contracted. Yet soon after the conclusion of the war the contentions began to appear upon the part of the debtor nations that it was unfair for us to insist upon payment according to the strict terms of the obligations. With a liberality unparalleled in the entire history of the world the United States agreed to a general scaling down of the debts, settling on terms varying from 80 cents on the dollar in the case of Great Britain down to 20 cents on the dollar in the case of Italy, and extending the time for payment to 68 years at the lowest possible rates of interest. We thus gave them $11,000,000,000 outright.

In the meantime, at Versailles a prostrate and vanquished Germany had been forced—justly as the Allies believed, unjustly as the Germans have passionately maintained—to assume a large part of the payment of the war in the shape of reparations. While the repayment of our loans to the Allies was in no wise conditioned upon the payment to them of reparations from Germany, a curious contention has grown up on their part that their obligations to us were contingent upon and limited by Germany's payments to them.

Since the end of the war an insistent propaganda, largely financed by certain international bankers, has been at work in the United States in favor of the cancelation or further reduction of these debts. These international bankers have in the last 15 years underwritten several billions of securities for these same debtor nations at liberal discounts which they have later largely sold to private investors but in which they still retain a considerable interest. Obviously, if the public debt owed the Government of the United States could be canceled, the chance for the collection of these private debts with their generous rates of interest would be measurably enhanced.

As a result of this propaganda in the United States and as a result of the increasing effects of the depression, there has been a steadily increasing demand on the part of the debtor nations that they be released from the undertakings solemnly entertained. We have been dubbed "shylocks" and "skinflints" by the nations which we saved from destruction for insisting upon the payment of obligations twice solemnly assumed and reduced an average of 50 percent through our generosity. The Right Honorable Neville Chamberlain, Chancellor of the British Exchequer, has twice expressed the hope in Parliament that while debt cancelation would doubtless be opposed by the ignorant yokels of the Middle West they would be finally overborne by the intelligentsia of the eastern seaboard. France, with that aloofness which seems to be characteristic whenever the subject of payment of her debts is under discussion, repeated her conduct of a previous historic occasion and simply refused to pay.

And yet throughout this period these very same nations have been squandering and compelling us to squander billions of dollars in a competition of armaments fully as insane, fully as criminal, fully as useless as that which precipitated the tragedy of 1914.

For 15 years France and her allies of the Little Entente have been brandishing a sword over Europe in a manner fully as truculent and fully as dangerous as any of the gestures of the Kaiser, which preceded the debacle of 1914. Italy, Russia, and Poland have long been under the control of brutal dictators, while the steady refusal of the Allies to carry out their obligations under the Treaty of Versailles to disarm has finally thrown Germany into the hands of the unspeakable Hitler, with his bestial and disgraceful campaign of anti-Semitism and his brutal attempt to stamp out every vestige of liberty and culture in the land. Japan wages at the moment a war of conquest and wanton aggression as unjustifiable as any in the world's history.

Gen. Tasker H. Bliss, American member of the supreme war council, once said that all the causes of the World War could be summed up in one sentence: "Too many men wandering around Europe with guns in their hands." And yet today, nearly 20 years after the outbreak of the war, there are a million more men under arms in Europe than in 1914. The expenditures of the nations for the next war exceeds the bill for armaments of 1913 by hundreds of millions of dollars. Preparation for new and more terrible carnage goes on apace.

In actual expenditure of cash we lead the world in expenditures on armament, for, although on the basis of per-capita armament we have made the smallest preparation for war of any of the leading nations except Germany, we get so much less for our money that our total budgetary expenditures stand highest.

In 1931, the last year for which figures of all nations are now available for comparison, the United States, weltering in depression, with 10,000,000 citizens out of employment, with industry staggering and finance in collapse, nevertheless, spent nearly $900,000,000 in preparation for the next war. England, faced with a dole system and an unemployment situation so acute as to threaten revolution, was, nevertheless, able to spend well above four hundred millions in arming for battle. Poverty-stricken France, protesting its poverty and its total inability to pay its debts, was able, nevertheless, to squander well above a half billion dollars in getting ready for conflict and to loan further vast sums to its allies for similar purposes. Italy and Japan, with depreciated currencies, both anxious to saddle their own expenditures in the last war upon the backs of the American taxpayers, were each able, nevertheless, to spend well above three hundred millions in military preparation. Even Poland, child of the conflict, existing, so far as its national finances are concerned, largely on the bounty of the United States and France, was able to dig up nearly a hundred million for war purposes.

The scene is again being arranged for war. The powder magazine is ready; the train is laid. At any moment a spark may set off another conflagration more ghastly, more costly, and more deadly than the last. Unless the statesmanship of the world is able to take steps for stopping this insane competition of armaments, this generation or the next will see an enlarged and intensified manifestation of the horrors which still oppress the world. Your boy and my boy may be asked to take their places in the red lane of death. The youth of every nation will again be sent to the shambles. Blood will again be poured out like water, and a bankrupt world will throw its remaining treasure into the devastating maw of war.

The assertion which we constantly hear that the best way to preserve peace is to constantly be prepared for war is in open defiance to the universal experience of mankind. No reasonable man would assert that the best way to preserve peace among individuals would be for each to go constantly armed to the teeth. We all know that the possession of arms by individuals is a constant and certain cause of personal conflict. Mild differences, slight disputes, inconsequential misunderstandings blossom easily into personal encounters when each disputant has ready to his hand a stock of weapons. And nations are but aggregations of individuals.

For the nations of the world to permit a situation to continue in which possibly this generation or almost certainly the next will witness another conflict, possibly involving the obliteration of our civilization, is stupendous and incredible folly. Peace treaties have proven of no avail. Arbitration courts, excellent in themselves, have shown themselves helpless to avert actual conflict. The League of Nations stands futile, helpless, and hopeless in the face of aggression. Disarmament is the only avenue to permanent peace. That way lies the hope of mankind. To achieve that course should be the goal of the statesmanship of the world.

So far as I am concerned, I am opposed to canceling a single penny of the debts owed us by other nations so long as they are squandering huge sums and compelling us to waste vaster sums on competitive armaments. I am opposed to canceling any of the debts unless they make it worth our while to do it. But to bring about disarmament insuring the peace of the world we could well afford to cancel all the debts. Even to put it on the most mercenary basis, and to disregard any higher basis, if we could bring about substantial pro-rata reduction in armaments enabling us to make similar reductions in our military and naval expenditures, it would be worth while for us as a mere matter of dollars and cents. Therefore, I believe that the United States should use these debts as an economic and diplomatic club to compel pro-rata reduction of armaments.

Upon the economic and disarmament conferences soon to be held depend the safety and progress of the world. Let us hope that there may be enough of enlightened public sentiment in all the nations to drive the statesmen and rulers of the world toward those reforms for which civilization is groping. God grant that we or our children may yet see that bright day of which the poet sings: "When the war drum throbs no longer and the battle flags are furled."

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had passed without amendment the bill (S. 1581) to amend the act approved July 3, 1930 (46 Stat. 1005), authorizing commissioners or members of international tribunals to administer oaths, etc.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5389) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes.

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, I send to the desk and ask to have read a letter relating to the case of a veteran in California.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the clerk will read as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

HOLLYWOOD, CALIF., May 26, 1933.

Mr. J. F. T. O'CONNOR,
Comptroller of the Currency, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: With the approval and consent of his excellency, the Most Reverend John J. Cantwell, Bishop of Los Angeles, I am writing this letter to you in the interest of a very good member of this parish. His name is John G. Carlisle. He is a grandson and namesake of the late Hon. John G. Carlisle, Speaker of the House of Representatives in the Forty-eighth, Forty-ninth, and Fiftieth Congresses, Senator from Kentucky from 1890 to 1893, and Secretary of the Treasury in the Cabinet of President Cleveland. During the World War he served as divisional liaison officer for the Eighty-second Division to the Forty-second Division, and was seriously wounded at the front by bursting of an enemy high-explosive shell. He is now, as a result, an invalid unable to engage in any lucrative occupation. For some years he has been granted compensation for his disability by the Government; but in April of this year he received a letter from the Veterans' Administration, without date or signature, removing him from the retired list. This action has been a great blow to him, as his retirement pay has been his only source of income and the only means of supporting himself and family. I feel sure that it is not the intention of President Roosevelt, in his policy of retrenchment, to permit such an action in the case of one who is so deserving.

I am aware of the fact that many similar appeals will be made to the Veterans' Bureau; but I am asking you, on the suggestion of his excellency the Bishop, to draw this particular case to the attention of the Honorable WILLIAM GIBBS MCADOO, Senator from California, in the hope that through your kind offices Mr. McADOO may have an interest in this case.

Mr. Carlisle is addressing himself directly to Mr. McADOO, supplying him with all the details of his service and disability. I consider Mr. Carlisle very deserving, and his excellency the Bishop and myself would personally consider it a favor if you saw fit to interest yourself to the degree of cooperating with Mr. McADOO in Mr. Carlisle's behalf.

Yours very sincerely,

CORNELIUS J. MCCOY, S.J., Pastor.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a paragraph appearing in an article recently published in the magazine Plain Talk. The article is entitled "Veterans Take a Licking."

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Plain Talk, May 1933]

I quote from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 9, 1917:

"In March 1915 the J. P. Morgan interests, the steel, shipbuilding, and powder interests, and their subsidiary organizations, got together 12 men high up in the newspaper world and employed them to select the most influential newspapers in the United States and sufficient number of them to control, generally, the policy of the daily press of the United States.

"These 12 men worked the problem out by selecting 179 newspapers, and then began an elimination process, to retain only those necessary for the purpose of controlling the general policy of the daily press throughout the country. They found it was only necessary to purchase the control of the greatest papers.

"The 25 papers were agreed upon; emissaries were sent to purchase the policy—national and international policy—of those papers; an agreement was reached; the policy of the papers was bought, to be paid for by the month; an editor was appointed for each paper to properly supervise and edit information regarding the questions of preparedness, militarism, financial policies, and other things of national and international nature considered vital to the interests of the purchasers.

"This contract is in existence at the present time (1917), and it accounts for the news columns of the daily press of the country being filled with all sorts of preparedness arguments and misrepresentations as to the present condition of the United States Army and Navy and the possibility of the United States being attacked by foreign foes.

"This policy also included the suppression of everything in opposition to the wishes of the interests served. The effectiveness of this scheme has been conclusively demonstrated by the character of stuff carried in the daily press throughout the country since March 1915.

"They have resorted to everything necessary to commercialize public sentiment and to sandbag the National Congress into making extravagant, wasteful appropriations for the Army and Navy under the false pretense that it was necessary. Their stock argument is that it is 'patriotism.' They are playing on every prejudice and passion of the American people."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I have here a statement sent me by Amputation Post, No. 1539, of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, of Minneapolis, Minn. Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I have just received a telegram from Col. Erskine B. Bassett, formerly colonel in the American Expeditionary Forces, Hopkinsville, Ky., reading as follows:

Howard Peacher, veteran, injured overseas, died here today, having been cruelly denied both hospitalization and compensation to save the credit of the United States.

What a hollow sound that phrase has today, "to maintain the credit of the United States", as if any nation could ever have any credit or any moral fiber that turned its back on its own defenders. A nation that will not deal generously with those who have shed their blood in its defense does not deserve to be defended. In order to do this terrific injustice to the defenders of the Nation the President of the United States sent that infamous measure here to us labeled "A bill to maintain the credit of the United States." It was of course misrepresentation of the worst hue. It was trickery and nothing less than that, because it had a sound with its weazle words that might somehow or other be attractive to the American people. Everybody knows now that it was deceit, pure and simple.

Mr. President, I have a letter from Mr. Roy E. Layton, a Spanish War veteran of Ohio. This discloses that in connection with the administration of the Economy Act, so called, a letter was sent to a lady out in St. Marys, Ohio, who has been deceased for 10 years, informing her that the Veterans' Administration have reviewed her pension claim and have allowed her $20 a month, the pension having been originally allowed on the death of her son who was killed in action. The letter reads as follows:

WAPAKONETA, OHIO, May 29, 1933.

Hon. ARTHUR R. ROBINSON,
United States Senator from Indiana,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR: Enclosed find an exact copy of a letter from the Veterans' Administration dated June 1, 1933, and addressed to Mrs. Jonathan Stonerock, 501 Pine Street, St. Marys, Ohio, stating that her claim has been carefully reviewed and that she has been awarded a pension in the amount of $20 monthly on account of the death of the veteran during war-time service.

Mrs. Jonathan Stonerock has been dead for nearly 10 years, viz, she died on August 28, 1923. At the time of hear death she was receiving a monthly pension or compensation on account of the death of her son during the World War and now she is again notified that she is entitled to a pension at reduced rates.

This seems to be a sample of the efficiency of the Veterans' Administration and hasty work based upon "careful review." Many veterans around here who served in the Philippine insurrection, and who were dangerously ill or seriously injured have received notice that their pensions have been entirely cut off before their affidavits could have possibly been reviewed and checked up. It looks as if someone in the Bureau of Pensions has made up their mind to cut them all off of the pension rolls, regardless of evidence that has been or may be submitted. In other words, there is no presumption whatever in their favor. If there are any veterans of the Spanish-American War who should receive a pension, they are those who served in the Philippine insurrection, in particular in the United States army of volunteers who underwent greater hardships and greater sufferings, and who contracted more serious diseases, and who were engaged in much actual warfare, whether you call them engagements or not, than any others perhaps who served in that war. I am not speaking for myself, as I was not one of them.

Thanking you for your efforts in behalf of the veterans, I remain,

Very truly yours,

ROY E. LAYTON,
Adjutant Wapakoneta Camp, No. 22, U.S.W.V.

Mr. President, there is enclosed with this letter to me a copy of a letter sent out over the signature of George E. Brown, director of compensation, to Mrs. Jonathan Stonerock. I shall not read the letter, but I ask to have it inserted in the RECORD at this point. I merely want to mention that the letter was received several days ago out in St. Marys, Ohio, by someone. It was addressed to a lady who has been dead for nearly 10 years. The letter is dated June 1. That is today. I received yesterday the original letter enclosing this copy of the letter from the Veterans' Administration. It must have been sent out from Washington a week ago, showing that the Veterans' Administration cannot wait for the date, June 1, does not wait for any evidence, but sends out a letter dated ahead of time to the mother of a deceased veteran, who herself has been deceased for the past 10 years. That is the way the Veterans' Administration is being handled under 1-man rule. One of the arguments advanced was that it would make for efficiency to place the Veterans' Administration in the hands of the President so as to improve efficiency of administration. Here is an example of their efficiency. They do not know who is alive and who is dead. I ask that the letter be inserted in the RECORD at this point.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, June 1, 1933.

MRS. JONATHON STONEROCK,
501 Pine Street, St. Marys, Ohio.

DEAR MADAM: A review of all claims in which payments of benefits were being made on March 20, 1933, was undertaken for the purpose of determining entitlement to benefits provided by Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government."

Your claim has been carefully reviewed in accordance with the provisions of the above-entitled act, and on the evidence of record in your case it has been determined that you are entitled to, and there is being approved in your favor, effective July 1, 1933, an award of pension in the amount of $20 monthly, on account of the death of the veteran during war-time service.

Regulations promulgated pursuant to the provisions of Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, provide that, except as to degree of disability, an application for review on appeal may be filed within 6 months from the date of this notice, or July 1, 1933, whichever is the later date. In the event you contemplate filing such an application, it is suggested that it be deferred until after July 1, 1933, when the condition of the work incident to the review of claims will permit of expedited action on applications of this character.

By direction.

GEORGE E. BROWN,
Director of Compensation.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Does the Senator mean to imply by his last statement that the mistake to which he has referred is chargeable to the President or to the fact that the President was given extraordinary authority? Does not the Senator know that the error occurred in the course of the administration of the Bureau, was an error committed by subordinates, and that in the very nature of things the President of the United States is not responsible for it? Does the Senator think it is a fair argument to present to this body or to anyone else, in criticism of the President, to say that someone in the Veterans' Administration wrote a letter to someone who has been dead quite a long time?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I am not saying who is to blame. I do not know.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. But the Senator did say who is to blame in his opinion.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I do blame the President for sending that bill here. It should never have been done. If it had not been for the so-called "economy bill"——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is not a question of sending the bill here. The complaint the Senator from Indiana is making is with reference to an error in the transmission of a letter to a person who has been deceased for 10 years. That is such a mistake as is not attributable to any act or power of the President nor could the President have taken precaution to prevent such a mistake.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. No, Mr. President; but I suggest in all good humor to my very good friend from Arkansas——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am happy to learn that the Senator is in a good humor. I am, too! [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I never can remain in a very good humor when I think about this so-called "Economy Act." I suggest to my friend from Arkansas that this has to do with reductions under the President's order and in accordance with regulations which directly flow out of the so-called "Economy Act." This would not have occurred had it not been for the so-called "Economy Act", for which I suppose the President is glad to take the responsibility. I certainly should not myself; but if he does take the responsibility for initiating that legislation, then I am correct in saying that this is a direct byproduct of that legislation and he is responsible.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Then, according to the Senator's statement, he is to blame for every error made by one of thousands of clerks in a department.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. O, Mr. President, I suppose finally someone must take responsibility for those errors, and I imagine it is the head of the department, and over him the Chief Executive, in whom is vested complete power.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I merely interrupted the Senator to ascertain if that was his viewpoint. The Senator has made clear to me what his opinion about the matter is; and I thank him for yielding.

AMBASSADOR TO ENGLAND—FOREIGN DEBTS

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, my own opinion is—and I think time will vindicate this judgment—that the President of the United States never can escape responsibility for the injustices that have come about as a result of the so-called "Economy Act."

Mr. President, while I am on my feet I desire to advert to another matter with reference to our new envoy in London, the Honorable Robert W. Bingham.

When the nomination of Mr. Bingham was sent to the Senate to be Ambassador to the Court of St. James's, information was placed in the hands of the Committee on Foreign Relations which indicated that Judge Bingham, during a temporary residence in England, had made statements derogatory to the United States. It was charged that Judge Bingham, while over there, in the course of a public address, had said that the failure of the Geneva Conference in 1927 was entirely due to the representatives of the United States. It was intimated that somehow or other their stupidity had resulted in the failure of that conference. It was suggested that they had not had a proper appreciation of the needs of Great Britain. His speech was derogatory to his own people. That is the point.

Some of us were alarmed about those charges, especially with the war debts coming on for settlement, and the problem of disarmament appearing before the world; and it seemed that it might not be wise to send over there to represent this country one who was more favorable to Great Britain than he was to the United States.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. In just a second I will yield.

So I took the responsibility of delaying final action by the committee for a period of some days until those charges could be investigated. As a result of the investigation that was made the Chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, the distinguished Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], assured the committee that Mr. Bingham himself had denied ever having made such statements or any such speech. On the strength of that denial, I think, the committee was reassured and voted for his confirmation, and he was subsequently confirmed by the Senate.

Now, Mr. President, it develops that evidently there must have been something in what was said before, because this new envoy, Mr. Bingham, scarcely gets to London until he makes another speech, this time undertaking to overturn the traditional policy of the United States against foreign entanglements which has existed since the days of the first President, General Washington.

I now yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I did not want to interrupt the Senator, nor did I want to take issue with him; but the question of war debts was mentioned in his remarks. As one who would like to see his own country get as much of the debts as it is possible to get, I am wondering how the debts can actually be paid in full in view of the fact that Great Britain has only $714,000,000 in gold monetary stocks, and she owes us nearly $4,000,000,000, and we will not let her pay in goods. I should be grateful if the Senator could show us how payment can be made.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I do not care to be diverted into a discussion of that subject at this time.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But as long as it has been raised, I will suggest to the Senator from Maryland—I have no desire not to discuss it—that in my judgment it could be paid easily. The installment amounts to an average of something under $200,000,000 a year.

Mr. TYDINGS. About $183,000,000 a year.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Something less than $200,000,000 a year; and Great Britain has, or had a month or two ago, the biggest supply of gold in all her history. She has paid her debts before, presumably, and I think she could pay these installments without a bit of difficulty. I think I could convince the Senator from Maryland that she could pay the debt, and pay in gold, for that matter, without any difficulty whatever, since apparently she has had great good fortune in garnering together in the last year more gold than she ever had before in all her history. But, as I say, I do not care to go into that matter at this time.

Mr. TYDINGS. I did not want to interrupt the Senator, but my reason for making that interrogatory was that when Judge Bingham's remarks are read in full, I think it will be found that all he was attempting to do in that speech was to be candid; and I believe that an ambassador who is candid is the best ambassador we can have.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator, of course, is entitled to his opinion, and he will permit me to hold mine.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BARKLEY in the chair). Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I do.

Mr. McCARRAN. I only wish to inquire of the Senator from Maryland, first, if his inquiry propounded to the Senator from Indiana is an opening wedge by which and from which we are to conclude that the administration favors the cancelation of foreign debts? Secondly, I desire to inquire if it is not true that England actually received this money from the people of this country; and why should they not pay it back?

Mr. TYDINGS. Of course, I have no authority to take the time of the Senator from Indiana, and I shall not do so. I did not say that we should cancel the debts; neither did I speak for the administration; but I shall be grateful to any genius upon this or any other floor who will show me how we can collect $4,000,000,000 of debts from a country that has only $700,000,000 of gold.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, let me suggest right there that up to date Great Britain has paid her installments when she had, if I remember the figures rightly, no more than $60,000,000 in gold after her installment was paid. If she could pay then, certainly she can pay with a gold stock of $800,000,000.

Mr. TYDINGS. Let me say to the Senator that he is in error. I shall not interrupt him again, but I should like to clear up his mind of one fact.

There is only eleven and one half billion dollars of gold in all the world.

We have four billions of that. That leaves seven and a half billions. The war debts amount to ten and one half billions of dollars. If we can only get $7,000,000,000, if we get all the gold in the world outside of the United States, how can our debtors pay ten and one half billion dollars of war debts?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The answer is perfectly obvious, and the answer lies in the truth of this statement—that up to date Great Britain has had no trouble in paying her installments with a tremendously lower gold stock than she has at present. So, if she could pay her honest indebtedness with a lesser supply of gold, why can she not pay her installment with two or three times as much gold as she ever had before?

Mr. TYDINGS. Will the Senator let me answer his question?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I do not wish to yield any further on that subject. I want to proceed with this discussion. That may or may not have much to do with Mr. Bingham.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Indiana yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Yes; I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I should like to inquire of both the Senator from Maryland and the Senator from Indiana if Great Britain had any particular trouble in borrowing that money from the United States and taking it out of the taxpayers of this country when she borrowed it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That is true.

Mr. President, I should like to mention at this time, too, that when one Mr. Bullitt was running around over Europe from one chancellery to the next, from one country to another, no one in the Senate seemed to know who he was, and yet information was emanating from the points of contact he had made over there that he favored, and was speaking for President Roosevelt—then the President-elect—a reduction of the debt on a basis of 1 to 10, one tenth of the total amount to be finally paid. Then it was denied that he had anything whatever to do with President Roosevelt.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. However, it developed since that scarcely had the incoming President been inaugurated when this same mysterious Mr. Bullitt was placed in a responsible post in the State Department, apparently with no definite duties assigned him; and now, to the amazement of some of us, this same man, who was running over Europe apparently without any credentials just 3 months or 4 months ago, now becomes the executive officer of the American delegation to the Economic Conference in London. So evidently Mr. Bullitt knew what he was doing back there in those days, and some of us who raised the question find now that perhaps our suspicions have been shown by recent developments to have been very well grounded.

I now yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, with the courtesy of the Senator from Indiana, I merely desire to say that I do not believe there is any justification for the statement or the implication in the statement of the Senator from Indiana that the President favors the cancelation of the debts, or favors a settlement of them on the basis of one tenth of the amount due, or anything like that.

The President, necessarily, in the conduct of foreign relations, realizes the difficulties that are to be met in collecting the debts; but there is every indication that he is abiding by and carrying out, insofar as it can be done, the joint resolution of the Congress upon this subject.

I think the Senator from Indiana would accomplish a helpful end if he would recognize that fact. I do not believe it can be beneficial to the cause of the Government of the United States to assert on the floor of the Senate, in contravention of what I understand to be the facts, that the President favors any such arrangement as that to which the Senator has referred. I think it will embarrass him in his efforts to collect the debts, or in his efforts to carry on negotiations respecting resumption of payments.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, I am glad to have the Senator's assurance that in his opinion the President does not favor cancelation or reduction of the debts. Of course the Senator will agree that many of the rumors and many of the reports that emanate from Europe are somewhat disconcerting, to say the least.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, with the Senator's permission——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I should like to say that there is no intention on my part to try to define what will be the policy of the administration respecting debts should an impasse be reached relating to the collection of the debts. I have no authority to do that, and do not assume to say what recommendation, if any, the President will make. I do know, as a matter of fact, that the President has not sought to compromise the matter; that he has not disregarded the existing law on the subject.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, yesterday there appeared in the Washington Herald an article, a Universal Service special cable, by Thomas C. Watson, under this caption:

United States Isolation Ended, Bingham Tells Britain. Envoy Admits Idea of Founders is Abandoned.

I want to quote just 2 or 3 sentences from the speech Ambassador Bingham is reported to have made over there, with the Prince of Wales beside him to cheer him on.

Ambassador Bingham said of the President:

"With the full support of the overwhelming majority of people whose leader he is, he has laid down what all other nations may rely upon implicitly so far as all our foreign relations are concerned."

Referring to United States Ambassador Norman H. Davis' statement at Geneva as meaning the United States reversal of a traditional policy of freedom from European entanglements, Ambassador Bingham declared:

"That marked the definite departure from certain principles maintained by the United States since the Nation was founded.

"It is a great step forward toward the maintenance of the peace of the world. It does contain certain reservations, but a similar reservation is retained by the British Government in the Locarno Treaty."

Then Ambassador Bingham proceeded as follows:

From my standpoint, I do not believe there is a 10-year-old child of average intelligence anywhere in the world who could fail in the event of war to select instantly the aggressor.

Mr. President, it is amazing that the American Ambassador could make such a statement as that—if he is correctly quoted—because historians today are undecided as to who was the aggressor in the World War, and for the past 15 years the question of war guilt has been raging and nobody presumes to know who was the aggressor. Yet, Mr. Bingham undertakes to say that we have overturned our traditional policy, that we are now going to enter a consultative pact to define and determine the aggressor, and that means, according to Norman H. Davis, the roaming Ambassador abroad, that it will be necessary for us to agree with the European nations to uphold artificial boundaries there, the status quo as it came out of the infamous treaty which was the product of the Versailles Conference, a treaty which we refused to ratify. We preferred to make a separate peace with the Central Powers.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. LONG. Was the speech about which the Senator is complaining an after-dinner speech of the new Ambassador, Mr. Bingham? It was an after-dinner speech, was it not?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. This was a dinner speech from which I am quoting—a speech delivered yesterday.

Mr. LONG. Of Mr. Bingham?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I will read this to the Senate:

Ambassador Bingham, addressing the Pilgrims Society at a Memorial Day dinner in his honor attended by the Prince of Wales, Foreign Secretary Sir John Simon, War Secretary Lord Hailsham, and a host of other officials and diplomats, stressed "the changed attitude on several subjects of the people of the United States."

I send the article to the desk at this point and ask that it may be incorporated in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Herald, May 31, 1933]

UNITED STATES ISOLATION ENDED, BINGHAM TELLS BRITAIN—ENVOY ADMITS IDEA OF FOUNDERS IS ABANDONED

By Thomas C. Watson

LONDON, May 30.—The foreign policy of the Roosevelt administration, as exemplified by America's expressions at Geneva of willingness to join a "consultative pact", marks America's abandonment of certain policies laid down by the Nation's founders, United States Ambassador Robert W. Bingham said tonight.

Ambassador Bingham, addressing the Pilgrims Society at a Memorial Day dinner in his honor attended by the Prince of Wales, Foreign Secretary Sir John Simon, War Secretary Lord Hailsham, and a host of other officials and diplomats, stressed "the changed attitude on several subjects of the people of the United States."

ADMITS UNITED STATES REVERSAL

Reiterating the "good neighbor" policy expressed by President Roosevelt in his inaugural address, Ambassador Bingham said of the President:

"With the full support of the overwhelming majority of people whose leader he is, he has laid down what all other nations may rely upon implicitly as far as all our foreign relations are concerned."

Referring to United States Ambassador Norman H. Davis' statements at Geneva as meaning the United States reversal of a traditional policy of freedom from European entanglements, Ambassador Bingham declared:

"That marked the definite departure from certain principles maintained by the United States since the Nation was founded.

"It is a great step forward toward maintenance of the peace of the world. It does contain certain reservations, but a similar reservation is retained by the British Government in the Locarno Treaty."

CITES CONGRESS ACTION

Remarking upon hesitancy of the Geneva Disarmament Conference in fixing a definition for an agressor nation and President Roosevelt's "definition" as the nation whose troops are found in foreign countries in violation of treaties, Ambassador Bingham said:

"From my standpoint, I do not believe there is a 10-year-old child of average intelligence anywhere in the world who could fail in the event of war to select instantly the agressor."

Commenting upon Europe's view that the President is not empowered to commit the United States to any policy without congressional assent, Ambassador Bingham said:

"It is necessary to realize that President Roosevelt has loyal and enthusiastic support in Congress and among the people to a degree unequaled in our history since George Washington.

"NO TIME FOR TRADING

"This is no time for mere trading and bargaining. There is no time for any thought except what shall we do to be saved.

"I believe that hope for this stricken world rests largely upon understanding, cooperation, and confidence among the English-speaking peoples."

Ambassador Bingham cited the "incredible" recovery of America economically since March 4. His speech was the first he has made in public since arriving. The dinner was held in the grand hall of the Hotel Victoria. Among the 300 guests were many prominent Mayfair hostesses.

Before the dinner Mrs. Bingham and Chargé d'Affaires Ray Atherton placed a wreath on the statue of Abraham Lincoln in Parliament Square. American legionnaires took part in Memorial Day ceremonies by placing a wreath on the Cenotaph, Britain's war memorial.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, does not the Senator think that in gaging the value to be given to this dinner speech we ought to find out at what point of the dinner it was given, also the menu and what other things were served?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. That might be an important thing to ascertain.

Mr. LONG. With the Prince of Wales sitting there at his side.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. And Sir John Simon.

Mr. LONG. And Sir John Simon—leaving this country and going over to a country where they never heard of Volstead, having a nice banquet, probably going out to Buckingham Palace late in the evening. We cannot tell what a man is likely to say under those circumstances. [Laughter.]

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, it is my judgment that the policy laid down by the first President of the United States, George Washington, admonishing against entangling foreign alliances, will continue to be the policy of this country long years after Ambassador Bingham is dead and gone. The point is that it does not help our international relations any to have an Ambassador talking wildly over there, as if he could overturn these policies, which are as old as the country, by mere words. Therefore he ought to be recalled and brought back to the United States, where at least people will not pay so much attention to what he says.

Mr. President, I want to refer again to Mr. Norman H. Davis. It seems, from the Morgan inquiry, that he is on one preferred list after another.

Not only is he heavily indebted to J. P. Morgan & Co., to the House of Morgan, but Mr. Davis is one of the pets of Morgan, on the preferred list, and therefore he must, if he is overseas negotiating for the United States, pay some attention to the House of Morgan. If he is representing the House of Morgan over there, the quicker he is brought back to this country the better, and I hope that will be at an early date.

Mr. President, before I resume my seat I want to state that the Morgan influence was present at the writing of the peace treaty at Versailles. That developed in a hearing before a Senate committee as a result of testimony of the late Mr. Davison, at that time one of the Morgan partners. Mr. Thomas W. Lamont, another one of the partners, was representing the United States Treasury at Versailles at the time the treaty was written.

I have here a copy of the report of the hearings before the Committee on Foreign Relations, questions asked by the distinguished Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], and the responses of Mr. Davison.

The substance of the examination and of the responses to the questions was simply this, that Mr. Davison felt that it was perfectly proper for Mr. Lamont to furnish the House of Morgan with a copy of the peace treaty before the Senate of the United States had a copy, or before the people of the United States could know the truth, because of the fact, largely, that they were international bankers, and had to deal with many of the governments of the world.

The hand of Morgan is just as thoroughly potent today in the affairs of this Government, apparently, as it was then. We have Mr. Norman H. Davis, one of the pets of the House of Morgan, heavily obligated by loans to that house, representing Mr. Roosevelt abroad, and we have the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Woodin, also close to the House of Morgan, running the Treasury of the United States.

I am sure the people of this country would feel far better, and have tremendously greater confidence in the Government of the United States, if both those gentlemen were separated from the public service.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5389) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I have on the desk an amendment which I have proposed, and I should like to suggest the following modifications, on line 6, after the word "compensation", to insert the words "or the pension"; on line 7, after the word "compensation", to add the words "or pension or may hereafter be granted compensation or pension"; on line 8 to strike out "10" and insert "15"; on line 9, after the words "per centum" to insert the words "below the compensation or pension to which they were entitled on March 20, 1933."

I should be glad to have the Secretary read the amendment, as modified.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will read the amendment, as modified.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

On page 61, between lines 6 and 7, add a new section, as follows:

"SEC. 21. That regardless of any provisions embraced in title I, of an act to maintain the credit of the United States Government, being Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, the compensation or the pension of those veterans who on March 20, 1933, were drawing compensation or pension or may hereafter be granted compensation or pension on account of service-connected disability, shall not be reduced more than 15 percent below the compensation or pension to which they were entitled on March 20, 1933. In any review of a veteran's case by the Veterans' Administration with a view to reducing the rating of or change the cause of his disability, the burden of proof shall rest upon the Government."

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Maryland?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, just for the moment I wish to comment upon the international situation as touched upon briefly by the Senator from Indiana.

In my humble judgment, the present depression is world-wide, and, in my humble judgment, one of the chief factors in the depression is the war debt, the unsettled, the evaded, war-debt issue; and until the statesmen and politicians of the various parliaments of the world make up their minds to tell the truth, unpopular though it may be, and to face some of the issues in the equation, the world will remain in a depression, or part of a depression, because a large part of it is due to the war debt.

What are the essential facts? First of all, about ten and a half billion dollars is owed to the Government of the United States by our allies in the last war. There is only eleven and a half billion dollars of gold in the entire world. We already have over four billion of that eleven and a half billion. That leaves seven and a half billion of gold in all the government treasuries of the world outside of our own; and I would be grateful indeed if someone would tell me how seven and a half billion dollars' worth of gold can be used to pay in gold ten and a half billion dollars' worth of debts.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Is not that about the best reason in the world why there should be an effort to remonetize silver, instead of the attempt being made to keep us on the gold standard?

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator knows I am in sympathy, in a basic way, if not in method, with what he says. England has about $750,000,000 in gold and $250,000,000 in silver. She has monetary stocks of gold and silver together of about a billion dollars, and she owes us $4,000,000,000 worth of debts. If anybody can show me or show England or show the United States or show the world how a billion dollars' worth of money can pay $4,000,000,000 worth of debts in money, I would be grateful to have that explanation.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I did not expect to yield for a long debate. If I may have the floor after we get through with this controversy, I will yield further.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, the Senator will have no difficulty in getting the floor.

Mr. TRAMMEL. I should like to get recognition to talk about a matter of very great importance to the ex-service men of this country.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland is recognized.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. I just want to make this passing observation, that if Ramsay MacDonald were here and making his most powerful argument, it probably would not be more cogent than that which has just been offered by the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, if the Senator from Nevada will answer the question which I propounded a while ago, he will find that I will go along with him to collect the last dollar, if he will show me how we can collect it; but, Mr. President, we know, if we are going to be honest about this thing and quit "buncoing" the American people, that foreign governments cannot pay ten and a half billion dollars' worth of war debts in gold with $7,000,000,000 of gold.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Let me suggest to the Senator that Great Britain has paid the installments of her debt up to date in gold, and with a tremendously lower stock of gold on hand than at present.

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not agree with the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Then, how has she been paying her debt up to date?

Mr. TYDINGS. Let us take the Senator's own argument——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. It is not an argument; I am merely asking a question. The Senator will agree that Great Britain's installments of the debt have been paid in gold?

Mr. TYDINGS. How does the Senator think they have been paid?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. They have been paid in gold.

Mr. TYDINGS. How does the Senator think they have been paid?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator and I will agree, I think, that so far they have been paid with gold.

Mr. TYDINGS. With ear-marked gold! Why, including all the gold either in England or available to the British Government in her entire monetary system——

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. She has now about $800,000,000 of gold on hand.

Mr. TYDINGS. She has $750,000,000.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The report I saw a few days ago—perhaps a month ago—was to the effect that Great Britain then had something like $800,000,000 in gold stocks, which was the top mark in all the history of Great Britain so far as her gold supply was concerned. If that be true, if she could pay when she was poor and had less gold, how does it happen that she now suddenly cannot pay her installments of the debt, with a larger supply of gold than she has ever had before?

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator has not answered my question; he is only asking me another one. I want to ask him if Great Britain has $800,000,000 in gold, where she is going to get the other $3,000,000,000 in gold with which to pay the United States?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. She will get it from year to year.

Mr. TYDINGS. How?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. It comes about through exchange. We have a money circulation here much greater than our gold supply, though all our currency has been backed by gold.

Mr. TYDINGS. I have asked the Senator the specific question where Great Britain was going to get the other $3,000,000,000 worth of gold, and he cannot tell me.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. It is in exchange which is constantly taking place.

Mr. TYDINGS. How? Does the Senator mean by Great Britain selling us more goods than we sell to her?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. No, Mr. President; but the gold supply is redistributed year after year.

Mr. TYDINGS. The Senator is wrong.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The question seems to me to be perfectly primary and elementary. Great Britain is paying us now much less than $200,000,000 a year, and she has a gold supply of approximately $800,000,000.

Mr. TYDINGS. I thought the Senator was going to tell me that Great Britain has built up her present supply of gold by selling more to other countries than she has bought from them, but we have sold to Great Britain since 1921 $6,000,000,000 more of American merchandise than we have bought of British merchandise. Great Britain has paid the present value of her war debt to us twice since 1921, in the payment of her unfavorable balances of trade.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I rest the case on the proposition that when Great Britain had a very small supply of gold, the lowest supply, perhaps, she had ever had, she still managed to pay her installments to the United States. Now, when her gold supply is greater than it has ever been in all her history, I refuse to believe that somehow or other it will be exhausted to such an extent by paying her honest obligation this year that next year she will not have any left.

Mr. TYDINGS. Without meaning any reflection on the Senator, he puts me in mind of the man who is in debt very heavily and cannot pay his way out, and who says to his creditor, "I am going to pay you", and the creditor asks, "How?" And the debtor says, "I do not know, but somehow or other I am going to pay you."

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. McCARRAN. There are two ways out, let me say in answer to the Senator's question: By legislation we have afforded Great Britain the opportunity to pay in silver to the extent of 200,000,000 ounces; and, secondly, facetiously, perchance, I might say that Great Britain might pay from the income taxes which she takes from our capitalists, as it has been disclosed she does by recent investigations.

Mr. TYDINGS. I am very glad the Senator from Nevada has brought up the question of the income tax, because it is a notorious fact that income taxes in Great Britain are five times, on many incomes, as high as are income taxes in the United States.

Mr. McCARRAN. The Senator will admit that they collect them over there, but such taxes are dodged here.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes; but even with the collection of the income taxes the Senator from Nevada cannot show, nor can any other man show, how Great Britain can increase her gold stock from $800,000,000 to $3,000,000,000 and more.

Mr. McCARRAN. When we open the gate for them to pay with legitimate money, why do they not pay? By an act passed by the Congress only a few days ago we gave them the avenue to pay. Why now open up the gates by which, undoubtedly, the administration proposes through the commission it has sent abroad to cancel the debts?

Mr. TYDINGS. Does not the Senator from Nevada know that Great Britain has been paying in gold? Why does the Senator assume, therefore, that Great Britain will not continue to pay?

Mr. McCARRAN. Then, why does the Senator from Maryland try to open the avenue by which she will not have to pay?

Mr. TYDINGS. No; I am simply facing the ultimate which we are all going to face in this Chamber in the next 6 years. We are going to face the stark realities on this debt question. We are going some day to tell the American people the truth about it; we are going some day to have to stand up and vote upon it. I, for one, am just as anxious as is anybody else to have the Government of the United States get every dollar it can, but what I am asking is how is the Government going to get the money?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana and Mr. McCARRAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield first to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I should like to make just this observation: One would think to hear the Senator talk on the subject that he had an idea that Great Britain had to raise $4,000,000,000 tomorrow. As a matter of fact, she has 62 years in which to make the total payment, so that it can be made in small installments. Furthermore, Mr. President, the rate of interest she is paying is only 3½ percent, and while Great Britain will be paying nothing on the principal, but just 3½ percent on her indebtedness for a period of 62 years, during all that time the American people will be paying above 4 percent, or an average of 4.7 percent, as I remember, on the Liberty bonds; and if Great Britain will just pay that 3½-percent interest on her indebtedness that will help us to pay the 4.7-percent interest for a period of 62 years, and her entire obligation will then be discharged. Does not the Senator feel that he ought to say something for the American people who have to pay the interest on the bonds?

Mr. TYDINGS. Oh, Mr. President, without any reflection upon the Senator from Indiana, what he is saying about my saying something for the American people is pure demagoguery. If the Senator can show that Great Britain either now or in the next 62 years can add to her gold stock sufficiently to build up $4,000,000,000 worth of gold, when there are only seven and a half billion left in all the world outside of the United States, I will be under very great obligations to him.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I agree with the Senator that for anybody to say a word for the American people is demagoguery.

Mr. TYDINGS. No, I did not say that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But if he speaks for the rest of the world or says a word for Great Britain and helps Great Britain "get by" without paying a portion of the interest which the American people must pay, any way, on their enormous indebtedness, then, he is broad-minded. But, Mr. President, the American people must not only pay 4.7-percent interest on the British debt, but we must also pay the principal. How are the American people to get the money with which to pay that debt? If the Senator feels that Great Britain should be spared and that Great Britain cannot even get 3½-percent interest with which to pay her debt over a period of 62 years, I am wondering how the American people can stagger along and pay 4.7-percent interest and the principal besides.

Mr. TYDINGS. What I want to bring out—and I ask the attention of the Senator from Indiana—is that the only way I know of that a nation can add to its gold stock is to sell some other nation more goods than it buys, so that the favorable balance in trade, payable in gold, will bring gold to the country, or that the residents of one country will go into the foreign country and expend exchange for pleasure, or that service will be rendered equivalent to goods or money. Great Britain cannot pay us in goods because the tariff will not permit it. As a matter of fact, as I said before, Great Britain has bought over $6,000,000,000 more of our merchandise since 1921 than we have bought of Great Britain's merchandise. In other words, since then, in unfavorable trade balances, she has paid the present value of the war debt twice.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. Just a moment. If we are not going to let Great Britain pay in goods, and if we are not going to let her pay in services, and she had not the gold, what I am asking the Senator from Indiana is, where is she going to get the gold with which to pay her $4,000,000,000 war debt?

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I assume it all boils down to this: If I understand the Senator correctly, he favors canceling the British debt?

Mr. TYDINGS. I do not favor canceling the British debt at all.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. But how can it be paid?

Mr. TYDINGS. But what I do favor is, if we are not going to get the money, to say so; and when I know we are not going to get the money, not to stand up here and insist on payment in full that cannot be made. In order that there may be no misunderstanding, I will give my position on the war-debt question. I favor a lump-sum settlement now, in 1933, of as much as we can get, and good-bye to the debt question, because the Senator from Indiana, who constantly tells us to keep out of European entanglements—and I am not out of accord with that sentiment—and daily shows that there might be another war over there, must know that if there should be another war in Europe, we would not get any of the money anyway; it will have gone for good. I should like to take all I can get now, wind up the debt settlement, revive trade, and start the world going again, instead of having all the countries of the world locked up, as they are now, so that a nation such as ours, which since 1893 has sold the world $35,000,000,000 more of its products than it has bought from the world, may again find adequate foreign markets, and so that our farmers, our workers, and our railroad men may be employed instead of being members of the army of the unemployed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. The Senator takes the same position, I assume, with reference to the French debt and all the other debtor nations?

Mr. TYDINGS. Absolutely; I would settle every one of the debts now through a lump-sum settlement. I would deal with each nation separately. The rate of settlement for one nation would not necessarily be the rate of settlement for another. All the circumstances in each case should be weighed.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. If they have not the money to pay now—and the Senator says cannot pay—it finally amounts to this, the Senator favors cancelation?

Mr. TYDINGS. It comes down to this, that, according to the Senator's own argument, if there were a new war in Europe; a bird in hand is worth ten hundred in the bush; and if the dangers which the Senator daily pictures as to what is likely to occur in Europe are one one-hundredth of one one-hundredth of one one-hundredth of one-thousandth of 1 percent as real as he seems to think, we will be a whole lot of money in pocket if we do settle the debts now and have them over with.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, may I suggest to the Senator that it did occur in 1917; we did get in the war; and what I am hoping now is that, in spite of blundering diplomacy, we will not get in again.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. TYDINGS. Just a minute; I cannot yield now. I remember 1916 very well. I remember when the then President of the United States, Mr. Wilson, was writing notes across the water every time something happened over there; when our rights were invaded, there was another note; and there were a lot of people in this country who said, "Why does he not stop writing notes? If Theodore Roosevelt were in the White House, he would not be writing notes."

Many people said that to me almost every morning; but I noticed when the President quit writing notes, when we really went to war, that many of the gentlemen who made these criticisms were no place to be found in the Army of the United States. They were tired of notes; they wanted action; Mr. Wilson was criticized as being a pacifist. I did not want the war; I was in favor of his notes; I wish he had written them until he ran out of writing paper. I could not see any value in the war, but I saw that we were likely to get into it, in spite of everything. However, we did not go into the war to save France or England or Italy; we went into the war because we considered our honor and our property and the rights of our nationals were being infringed upon; we declared war very formally; and from the minute we went into that war it was our war just as much as it was the war of any other country.

What happened then? It took us a year to get 300,000 men across the water, few of whom saw active service in that time and few of whom were casualties during the first year of the war, and during that time our allies, by the hundreds of thousands in the British, French, Belgium, and Italian Armies, died on the battlefield, holding back our enemy as much as their own.

Then what happened? They said they were running short of supplies and we let them have the money, about $10,500,000,000. Did they take the money out of the country? Of course they did not take it out of the country. Much of it was put on deposit right here in the United States, where it was used to buy shells and munitions and clothing and food which we furnished over there while they were holding the front and losing their men by the hundreds of thousands while we were training back here in the training camps.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. Just a moment. I have not yet finished painting this picture.

Now we come, after the war is over—our war, not only their war—and ask for payment of 100 cents on the dollar. Let us switch the situation around for a moment and see how we would view the matter from their angle. Let us suppose that nation X, out beyond the Pacific, and our own country are engaged in war, and we have been fighting for 3 years. Let us assume we are getting the worst of it. Great Britain comes into the war after 3 years because of some incident, but she has not an army ready. While our troops are entrenched on the fields of Kansas, dying by hundreds of thousands for a year before the British Army can be transported over here, we borrow from Great Britain, not money—because the money did not go over to England or France or Italy in the World War—but we borrow credit to the extent of $10,000,000,000 for clothing and shells and munitions with which to fight the British war as well as the American war against nation X.

If that were the case, I wonder if the Senator from Indiana would not be on the floor of the Senate at this hour saying, "Think of it! Our men, our ex-service men, shed their blood upon the fields of Kansas in the war with nation X, held the battle lines with their breasts bared while their women and children were saddened at home, through one long year, while Great Britain, in the same war, was getting ready, and Great Britain loaned us $10,000,000,000 worth of food and clothing and supplies in the same war, and now, after it is all over, she asks us to forget the loss of our men, and asks only to pay the bond, to pay 100 cents on the dollar."

Mr. President, the Senator from Indiana would say, "Has that nation no heart? Has it no conscience? Has it no humanity? When our boys were holding the front in Kansas in this war with nation X, dying by the hundreds of thousands, they were only getting ready over there in Britain, were contributing food and munitions and clothing, and now, when it is all over, Great Britain asks us to pay in full 100 cents on the dollar."

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President——

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Indiana.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I applaud the Senator's enthusiasm and his eloquence.

Mr. TYDINGS. No; it is only a statement of facts. There is no enthusiasm about it.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I was just thinking, as the Senator spoke so eloquently, what a pity it is that his speech could not be made in the French Chamber of Deputies or in the English Parliament.

Mr. TYDINGS. O Mr. President, there is nothing holding this world back like criticizing other governments. That is one of the things that is wrong today—the failure of men in the parliaments of the world to blame their own government where blame is often rightfully due, and not always the other fellow's government, because sometimes all governments like all individuals are in the wrong. The man who is serving the world in this hour of depression is ready to call his government when he thinks his government is wrong. I have no use at all for the man who thinks the other government is always wrong and his own government is always right. Governments are made up of human beings and none of them has a patent on rectitude.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. Is not the Senator aware that a great many men were sent to prison during the war for expressions of that kind?

Mr. TYDINGS. What kind?

Mr. BONE. For saying they did not agree with their own government.

Mr. TYDINGS. Yes.

Mr. BONE. Had the Senator expressed that opinion in 1917, he might have been sorry.

Mr. TYDINGS. I did express it in 1917, and I will express it again and again, as long as I live.

Mr. BONE. I am not out of harmony with the Senator.

Mr. TYDINGS. I understand; nor am I out of harmony with the Senator from Washington. I may be wrong about it, and if I am I will be the first to admit it; but so far as I know there has been no man able to say, with only $11,500,000,000 worth of gold in the world, with our own Government in possession of over one third of it, with $10,500,000,000 worth of war debts owing and payable in gold, how the $10,500,000,000 can be paid out of the remaining $7,000,000,000 worth of gold.

Mr. McCARRAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from Nevada?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. McCARRAN. The speech made by the Senator from Maryland brings back to mind the propaganda that prevailed in this country and was broadcast here under British dominance and under British money before the war was declared. It is the same stuff we listened to before we went into the war. It is regrettable now that we must listen to it again when they want to cancel their debts. Apparently, these views come from the administration as the first shot toward a cancelation that will never, in my judgment, be approved by the Senate.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I shall have to interrupt the Senator long enough to say that I do not speak for the administration. I have never discussed this matter with any member of the administration. I am speaking here in my own individual right and in no other capacity, directly or indirectly; and, thank God, I am speaking what I honestly believe to be the truth.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield to the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. LONG. With the powerful minds in the Senate unable to agree on this question, the lesser minds are indeed in serious difficulty at this time.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I did not want to enter upon the discussion of an issue which is not before the Senate, and only because it was mentioned by the Senator from Indiana did I attempt to reply at all. I leave this prophecy with the Senate. We may all say we expect to be paid in full. We may never accept the lump-sum settlement. We may insist on payment of these debts to the last dollar. But some day, perhaps within the next several years, we are going to have to face the grim reality of the situation; and I am going to await the suggested solutions when stark facts force a decision upon us.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I do not propose to enter into the controversy in regard to foreign debts. I think there are matters at this time of a good deal more interest to those who were vitally concerned in the war as fighters and defenders of their country than a discussion of the foreign debts owing to the United States.

I am not one who has tried to encourage Great Britain, France, or any of our other foreign debtors in the thought or to argue that we are ready and willing to offer a settlement of compromise or cancelation of their debts. I have entertained the view that the best way for us to collect those debts is to say that we expect them to be paid in full. They owe us the money. The money was raised by the American people and we expect them to pay the debts. I believe that policy would have a more wholesome effect upon our foreign debtors than a policy of telling them that we know they cannot pay.

When my good friend from Maryland and others advocate this soft road for our foreign debtors, I am reminded of a little incident in my younger days. Probably some other Senators may have had a similar experience. When I was a young fellow, working as a traveling salesman, I went into a little country hotel about noontime one day. When I registered there was no one there except a small boy about 10 or 12 years of age. I said, "Where is your father?" He said, "He is down at the store. We run the store and we run the hotel, too." I said, "What is the price of dinner?" He said, "If you are not a traveling man, it is 75 cents. If you are a traveling man, it is 50 cents." I said, "Of course, under those circumstances, I must be a traveling man."

I imagine that our foreign debtors, when they hear of Americans who are to have something to do with the settlement of the debt question saying that they think the European nations cannot pay, and then proceeding to detail why they cannot, at least get some cheer and some hope from that kind of utterance. I would rather take the attitude that we expect them to pay in full. That is my position in the matter. I think we have made sufficient sacrifice and sufficient reduction to our foreign debtors.

I am not in favor of trying to palliate them or encourage them in the thought that they are going to get cancelation or even reduction.

Why, take the case of France. They plead inability to pay even interest of $19,000,000, and yet in the press, a couple of weeks ago, France had agreed upon an expenditure of more than $500,000,000 for military purposes for next year. Why not 19 millions less, if necessary, of their military establishment and the use of this sum to pay an honest debt to America?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The argument is constantly being made that the foreign governments cannot pay. I saw a marshaling of figures the other day that gave the amount of money that is paid by our own country or our own citizens to the people of Europe. Take any one of the countries that are debtors of ours, whether it be Great Britain or France or Italy. The amount of money that goes to them from the citizens of this country is something like three or four times the annual debt payment required under the settlement plan.

This money comes to them from such sources as tourists, immigrant remittances, charges on marine carrying, and the triangular transactions where we buy from South America and pay money and then South America sells to Great Britain or to France, so that the trade becomes a triangular affair. From these sources, every dollar of which comes from the United States, these countries could pay four times over the annual charge and never take a single dollar out of their treasury that does not come from the United States itself.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I heartily agree with the Senator; and I think if we had not so many people here in America encouraging the idea that there is going to be a cancelation or modification of debts, there would not now be such persistent effort on the part of these foreigners to get us to forgive the debts entirely, or to make a very substantial reduction in addition to the reduction we made when we made the debt-adjustment settlements, beginning in 1923, when we forgave them about half or more of the debts that they owed us at that time. I will say I voted against these adjustments because I thought our country was making too much of a concession.

My point is I am against the idea of a reduction or cancelation with our foreign debtors. I think they ought to do their honorable duty and pay these debts and keep up the interests, and that they should be making a diligent effort to do that instead of trying in every way possible to avoid their obligations and to persuade the American officials that they should forgive these debts, and then make the taxpayers of American keep on and keep on paying the money which was raised from the people of America to make these loans to foreign nations.

I did not mean to drift on this foreign-debt subject; but it is my purpose to speak more at length in regard to the pending amendment offered by me.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for just one observation?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield; but I hope the Senator will make it brief. He has spoken a good deal already on this subject. I always listen with interest to him, but I want to discuss the amendment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I think the Senator is quite right. I simply want to agree with the Senator in his statement that if the foreign debtors do not pay these debts, the American people will have to do so.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly; that is the inevitable.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just one moment?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Gladly.

Mr. FESS. I do not want to be understood as being opposed to any sort of an adjustment. That is, I want it to be understood that I would be willing to have the matter taken up for discussion if I could be assured that the efforts to discuss this problem are not designed to lead to cancelation. That is what I am afraid of. I should not object to having matters reopened and having the whole subject studied; but my suspicion is that all of this effort is to lead ultimately to cancelation. For that reason I am very much disturbed about all the suggestions of international conferences opening the discussion of a question like this.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I dislike always to propose an amendment to a measure that is not really germane to the contents of the bill which is being considered; but I think the emergency today thoroughly justifies the presentation of the amendment now before the Senate.

I know, from expressions upon the floor of the Senate yesterday and from statements I have heard in private conversation with different Senators, that at least 95 percent of the Members of this body are in favor of remedying the condition which has brought such abuse and such unreasonable and unexpected treatment to the veterans of this country in the name of the so-called "Economy Act."

I have read the Economy Act carefully within the past day or two; and, while it contains provisions under which there may be by a strained construction a semblance merely of authorization for the regulations which have been promulgated, I say that a study of the provisions of title I, which applies to our veterans, shows that it does not indicate or express, directly or indirectly, any such intent as has been put into force under the harsh regulations which have been prescribed in the name of the Economy Act.

We who voted for the Economy Act were assured that it would be justly and liberally applied so far as the veterans of this country were concerned, and with such assurance we did not desire to oppose our Democratic President, who was and is struggling so patriotically for the Nation. My good friend from Arizona, Mr. ASHURST, who, I see, is not in his seat—but that does not make any difference, for I have made about the same remark to him—may take responsibility, if he wishes, for the orders and the regulations which have been issued by the Veterans' Bureau under the provisions of the Economy Act; but, so far as I am concerned, I do not assume responsibility for the unreasonable and the unfair regulations which have been imposed, in many instances, in regard to great groups of our veterans.

If Congress does not think it is proper that this treatment should be accorded to the veterans, I think it should perform its duty and enact legislation to correct this miscarriage of the intention and the purpose of Congress in acting upon the urgent request of the President for the enactment of the Economy Act.

I have every confidence in the President of the United States. I am a great admirer of his. I think he is making a splendid President. I like his courage and his initiative and his set purpose in his endeavors to restore the Nation to its former prosperity. I know, however, that the President never had an opportunity to go over all these regulations. He may be considering making some modification or changes of them; but when the law was enacted we were told that it was going to be enforced generously and justly toward the veterans of this country. At the present time I do not care to rely upon some grapevine messages that may or may not come to the effect that the regulations are going to be modified and changed so as to give justice and more generous treatment to the veterans.

We have tried this out for more than 2 months in the administering of veterans' affairs; and what a record, what a tragedy, confronts us! I presume the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs and the Director of the Budget prepared these regulations and these orders. We have been sorely disappointed, and thousands upon thousands, and even millions, of veterans in this country have been treated as though they were unworthy of the aid and assistance of the Government, instead of being treated as patriots of the Nation, as they should be.

I was taught at my mother's knee to have regard and esteem for the man who took up arms and went forth in defense of his country in its hour of peril; and that respect and appreciation for those who rally to their country's flag, who prove their courage, their loyalty, and their devotion to their homeland first instilled and inspired within me by my good mother has continued until this day; in fact, has become intensified with the passing of the years and a mature realization of the hideousness of war.

One of the most inspiring scenes I ever witnessed was during the early days of the World War, when a great army of American soldiers, who had come from town and city and countryside, was assembled here in Washington, and there was a parade on Pennsylvania Avenue composed of some fifty thousand of the very flower of the young manhood of this country who were going forth to fight the battles of the Nation. I was thrilled with admiration for them at that time. Every impulse of my patriotism and my love and esteem for the defenders of the country, who were willing to respond and do their duty, was quickened at that time by that wonderful picture of gallantry, of devotion, and patriotism.

I witnessed another quite in contrast with the first when the war was all over. Upon the same historic avenue, in the same city of Washington, I saw the picked division of all the American troops, coming back as victors, march through this city; and as they did I was doubly inspired and thrilled with love and devotion for the men who had rallied to the colors and gone across the seas and fought upon foreign fields, where many of them had sacrificed their lives and others had fallen wounded for the cause of our Republic.

Senators, ever since that time I hope I have never been recreant in my duty to pay honor to these brave men, and to extend to them, as far as possible within my power, a just tribute and a just token of the Nation's esteem and gratitude to the living and to revere in cherished memory the gallant dead. I never could have dreamed that there would throb in the heart of any man such sentiments as to promulgate and begin the enforcement upon these loyal veterans of the Great War of such regulations as have gone forth in the name of the Economy Act. I do not believe the President is responsible for this black page in our history. I think it is purely the responsibility of those who are formulating and administering the veterans' affairs after their own fashion.

I am not going to read cases, but I have a great number of them, telling of injustices; and when I make inquiry of the Veterans' Bureau, while, of course, I get no admissions of any injustice on the part of the Veterans' Bureau, the evidence which comes back to me corroborates, as I see it, the injustice about which the veteran has complained.

I know of cases of injustice to bed-ridden persons, and have the records in my files. One soldier wrote me that he had been gassed upon the battlefield; that he had been confined to hospitals for 8 or 9 years, and he said no person who had not had a similar experience could imagine the torture he had endured during these 8 or 9 years from the effects of being gassed. He said that he had been unable to sleep lying down during all this period of time, because the greater part of the time he felt that he was about to choke to death; and yet, under these regulations, the Veterans' Bureau notified him—he is still in a hospital—that his compensation was being reduced from $90 a month to $20 a month.

Another poor fellow told me that he was totally blind in one eye and could scarcely see at all with the other eye, and the record shows that his case was of service origin. The other case I mentioned was also of service origin, and was so recorded. They gave this almost totally blind veteran notice that his compensation would be reduced from $100 a month to $23 a month, I think it was.

Any Senator who wants to take the responsibility for such conduct and treatment of a veteran as that, because he happened to vote for the bill, is welcome to do so; but it is so foreign to the ideas and the views which I entertain that I admit no responsibility whatever, and I do not think any other Senator is responsible for any such action as that.

I think we ought to do something to try to remedy the situation. During the past 16 years as a Member of the Senate I have felt that I owed a great debt of gratitude to these veterans, that the Nation was a thousand times over their debtor. It just happens that I was the one who offered the amendment which brought about the $60 bonus given to each veteran upon discharge after his returning from the war. I supported the cash compensation idea during the early years after the war, having introduced in the Senate and fought for cash compensation bills, and at the time we enacted the Compensation Certificate Act I thought it was better, and I so voted, to give them cash compensation instead of these certificates. That was what they really preferred.

The compensation certificates were practically forced upon them, as far as the great rank and file were concerned. I think they should now be paid at face value. Of course, some of the officers of some of the veterans' organizations, like the American Legion, of that character, a good many of whom were at the forefront at that time and occupied swivel-chair jobs during the war, did not seem to think that a man ought to have anything, and a goodly number of them today do not think the soldiers are being mistreated when we cut off their compensation, reducing the compensation of bed-ridden, of blind, and those suffering with every character of disease. They do not rebel when the sick and wounded are cast from the hospitals into the streets and thrown upon charity. They do not seem to think there is anything wrong about it. That does not worry them at all. I refer to a certain few among the veterans who live in affluence and in luxury, and most of whom had swivel-chair jobs during the war, and perhaps themselves are drawing big salaries from the Government or from Government subsidies. They do not care much about it. Of course, they have a right to their opinion, but it is contrary to my sense of justice and my view of giving proper recognition to our soldiers.

Mr. President, while I understood—not directly, of course, but from those representing the administration in recommending this law—that it was desired that some revision be made of the rolls, and that there should be an investigation and elimination, more or less, of those who were upon the rolls who were thought not to belong there, I had no intimation and no information from those who proposed the Economy Act that they expected to practically take away the compensation of service-connected cases, and that they intended to absolutely wipe out, as far as possible, the pensions which had been allowed to the Spanish War veterans. Yet that is what has taken place in the name of economy, under the Economy Act, and I charge it is contrary to the spirit of the law and violative of what Congress was led to expect.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield for a question.

Mr. HATFIELD. What percentage of the Spanish-American War veterans will the Senator's amendment affect?

Mr. TRAMMELL. It will affect the disabled, those who had service-connected disabilities. I have not attempted to try to remedy all the ills which exist, and anybody knows that if we attempt to do that in this body in a general revision of the present law we have no chance to get through the legislation. So I put pensioners in with those who draw compensation and pensions for service-connected disabilities. That was my object in restricting it to that class, not that I favor that restriction. It is merely a matter of expediency.

Mr. HATFIELD. The Senator feels that is the best he can get?

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is my firm opinion as far as amending the pending bill. I had hoped that this much could be attained. There is a common sentiment throughout the country on the part of civilians and on the part of veterans and on the part of our people generally, that the service-connected cases should not have been materially disturbed on account of the Economy Act.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator another question?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. Could Spanish-American War veterans whose cases are presumptively service connected, come in under the Senator's amendment?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I think they can come in under it, in view of the fact that the amendment requires that the burden of proof shall be upon the Government if an effort is made to eliminate a veteran from the roll. When a man has once submitted his claim, as have these soldiers who will come under the provisions of my amendment, and the Government has scrutinized it and investigated it, and, I am sorry to say, in probably 90 percent of the instances resolved all doubts against the soldier, when that has once been done and the soldier, regardless of an unsympathetic consideration by the Bureau, has been placed upon the roll as a service-connected case, then I say that it is the height of injustice, it is a procedure which does not exist in any other tribunal in this country, to provide that the man shall subsequently be forced to come in and reestablish his case. That is what is being attempted, that is apparently the policy of today.

Mr. President, if there is litigation in the courts of the country, and there is a verdict, if there is a decision rendered, after the case is adjudicated by the court of last resort, if it is appealed, it is never said, "We are going to call the successful litigant in and make him reestablish his case, although judgment has been rendered in his favor." Such course would meet with the condemnation of the people of any civilized nation. There is no procedure of this character which has ever been applied, as far as I know, other than in the instant cases.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, does the Senator want a vote on his amendment this evening?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I should like to have a vote, of course, if we can get to one.

Mr. BONE. I should like to speak for a moment on the Senator's amendment when he is through.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Very well. The amendment, briefly stated, applies to all service-connected cases which are upon the rolls and which have been passed upon, either involving compensation or pension, the word "pension" being used with a view to giving the same consideration to the Spanish-American War veterans, who have been most unmercifully treated. The Spanish-American War veterans have been cut all the way from $40, $50, and $60 a month down to $6 a month, and they would have, in my opinion, been stricken entirely from the rolls if there had not been a provision in the Economy Act providing that the range should be from $6 to $275 a month.

Why did the proponents of this legislation insert in the bill the maximum of $275 a month? Who did they intend should receive $275 a month? Yet the maximum was fixed at $275 and the minimum at $6. The Spanish-American War veterans, in my opinion, would have been entirely swept from the map and left no compensation whatever if it had not been for the minimum restriction inserted in the law, I think through an amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, the Senator just asked who was supposed to get the $275 a month. Perhaps the Senator will pardon me, if it seems impertinent, if I quote from the testimony of Mr. Douglas before the Committee on Finance. He was asked that particular question, and he replied:

I am not certain that that is too high for the man, say, who has lost 2 arms or 2 legs in the service.

Senator McKELLAR. Or two eyes.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Yes. I am not certain that that is too high for a man who has received a disability of such great magnitude as the loss of 2 arms or 2 legs or 2 eyes.

* * * * * * *

Frankly, for a man who was overseas and who was in the big show and was under fire and was shot to pieces by a high explosive, and lost 2 arms, or 2 legs, or 2 eyes, my honest opinion is that that is not too high.

* * * * * * *

And my sympathy goes out to such a man. He certainly gave something for his country.

The Senator will recall that it has been repeatedly stated on this floor that many men who have lost 2 legs, 2 arms, or 2 eyes have been cut down so that today they are getting a pittance.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I thank the Senator. That is very true. I had not read that evidence. It may be recalled that the hearings before the Finance Committee were not printed and delivered to the Senate until the bill had already passed the Senate on March 18 or 19. I mentioned the fact of the $275 maximum to show that someone who had to do with the preparing of the Economy Act had in contemplation the fact that there were some worthy cases of service origin which should be reasonably compensated.

Mr. CUTTING. If the Senator had asked me who was getting the $275 a month, I should not have been able to give the Senator an answer.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I thank the Senator for his information. The records show that a great many have been cut from $100 to $20, and from $90 to $20, and others from $50 or $60 down to $12 or $13 or $14. One Spanish-American War veteran who is 67 years old wrote me that they had cut him from $40 down to $6. Of course the cases affected would naturally be brought to the attention of Senators, but practically all of the veterans have been detrimentally affected.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. If I may have the attention of the Senator from New Mexico, on the point to which the Senator called attention with reference to the testimony of Mr. Douglas, and his statement that $275 a month was not too much for the man with both legs lost in battle, I call the Senator's attention to the fact that there is a man from my State down here in one of the departments, a man by the name of McKenzie, who in battle lost both his legs near the hip, shot off with machine-gun fire, and he was wounded in several other ways. He formerly drew $175 a month on account of those disabilities, and has now been cut to $100. That illustrates the way in which a man with both limbs gone, who has to go around with an improvised crutch arrangement, instead of getting $175, has been cut to $100.

Mr. CUTTING. He may have Mr. Douglas' sympathy. He did not get very much else out of the situation.

Mr. CONNALLY. His name is McKenzie.

Mr. CUTTING. There is a case almost identical with that in my own State.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield again?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. In keeping with the point which has been raised by the distinguished Senator from New Mexico, I ask permission of the Senator from Florida to read a letter from a disabled veteran. It is very brief.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. This letter is addressed to me from Martinsburg, W.Va., dated May 26, and reads as follows:

MARTINSBURG, W.VA., May 26, 1933.

Hon. H. D. HATFIELD,
United States Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: I am a disabled World War veteran. I had my spine broken down in 1918 in France; have two fractured vertebræ, have never been able to work since discharge; wear a steel cast; spend about half of my time in bed. Last examination at hospital shows a T.B. condition. I was getting $90 for my wife and myself. Received notice May 22 I would be reduced to $40 per month on July 1. I am interested in a square deal, but it looks like I have been hit with the "new deal."

I hope I will be given some consideration.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM H. LICKLIDER,
1113 Washington Avenue, Martinsburg, W.Va.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I have a number of cases right along that line which are very pathetic; and it is very distressing to me to think of the treatment accorded to men in such condition, men who have never been guilty of any disloyalty to their country, whose only offense, if it be a crime, which, of course, I do not think it is, has been devotion to their country to the extent of bearing arms in defense of the American flag, and who, on account of the services thus willingly and patriotically performed, have been stricken down in their good health, and are now invalids, some of them blind, some of them with crushed spines, and some of them suffering from other injuries which have destroyed their health and their opportunity to gain a livelihood. I have not introduced into the RECORD any of their letters, but I have a great many of them of the same character as that read by the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. I hold in my hand an X-ray picture taken of a World War veteran who has lost his right leg and thigh. This X-ray picture discloses the fact that the limb has been disarticulated at the hip joint; his body in many places has been punctured with bits of shrapnel, some of the pieces found in the soft tissue of his back and shoulders and arms, others resting against the spinal column, with other metallic pieces entering the bony structure of the vertebra. In other words, this soldier is a hopeless cripple. I will read his letter with the permission of the distinguished Senator from Florida. It is as follows:

HUNTINGTON, W.VA., May 12, 1933.

Hon. H. D. HATFIELD,
United States Senator, Senate Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: You will please find enclosed a letter from the Veterans' Administration of Charleston, W. Va., dated May 1, 1933, in which they state that my monthly allowance will be in the amount of $80 per month on account of my war-time, service-connected disabilities. They are still rating me on my 86 percent disability on account of the loss of the use of a right foot.

My dear Senator, I would appreciate it very highly if you will look into this matter and stop this 86 percent disability business that those people in the Charleston office are trying to hang on me.

With kindest personal regards I remain,

Yours very truly,

ELZA LEE SNYDER,
Box 212, Huntington, W.Va.

It thus appears that a reduction has been made in the soldier's compensation of 36 percent. This soldier was brought to my office about 3 weeks ago by an attendant in an automobile from Huntington, W.Va. These pictures were taken in Washington, D.C.

Mr. TRAMMELL. What was the reduction in that case?

Mr. HATFIELD. The reduction in his compensation was 36 percent. The veteran was receiving $125 a month. He is, of course, 100 percent disabled; he must have a paid assistant all the time; he is completely incapacitated. His wounds give him continuous pain. Some of the shrapnel fragments have lodged inside the vertebral column, pressing upon the spinal cord with a continued pain and suffering upon the part of the soldier; yet he is to be reduced to $80 a month, an amount which is not sufficient to take care of him in his hopeless and helpless condition. I submit for the RECORD, if the Senator will permit——

Mr. TRAMMELL. I have no objection.

Mr. HATFIELD. The X-ray finding in this case, so that it may be read by those who are interested.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it will be printed in the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

CLINICAL RECORD—RÖNTGENOLOGICAL REPORT

VETERANS' ADMINISTRATION,
Washington, D.C., April 13, 1913.

X-ray fluoroscopic findings: Radiographic examination of the right elbow, left forearm, right shoulder, right hip, and low back, shows small metallic foreign body superficially in the inner side upper third left forearm; old tiny ununited chip fracture of external condyle; no evidence of pathology in shoulder joint; two metallic foreign bodies noted in the chest wall. Pelvis shows disarticulation of the right hip; lumbar spine shows two small metallic foreign bodies just to the left of the twelfth dorsal vertebra. There is fusion of the right sacro-iliac and considerable arthritic change of the right sacro-iliac junction, probably traumatic in origin.

J. F. ELWARD, M.D., Röntgenologist.

No. 30202, Snyder, Elza L. (202–10).

Mr. HATFIELD. This report not only shows that he has had his right leg amputated at the hip, but that his body is practically riddled with shot and shell, nevertheless he has received notice that his compensation has been reduced from $125 to $80 a month.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I feel, Mr. President, under the circumstances and conditions which face us, that it is my duty—of course every Senator has to say whether it is his duty or not—to make an earnest effort to correct this situation; to correct it in part if we cannot correct it in toto. This amendment will go a long way toward remedying the conditions so far as the service-connected cases are concerned. It provides that there shall not be more than a 15 percent reduction in cases of that character. Those in charge of the Veterans' Administration have been reducing the compensation in cases of this character all the way from 30 percent to 60 or 70 percent. This amendment proposes to restrict the reduction to not exceeding 15 percent—a reduction I think that is ample if not too much.

The Congress has not seen proper to bring about a reduction exceeding 15 percent in the salaries of the civil employees of the Government. While I believe in economy, I also believe that it should be brought about in fairness and justice. I think that a 15 percent reduction is sufficient in the smaller brackets of the salaries; but I do not agree with the policy that we should reduce the smaller salaries to such an extent that their recipients can scarcely keep body and soul together, and then reduce the larger salaries by only the same percentage. I have on previous occasions discussed that question to some extent.

A majority, at least, of the Senate and the House have not seen proper heretofore to require a person receiving a salary of $10,000 per annum or $12,000 per annum or $15,000 or $18,000 per annum to take a larger percentage of reduction than the employee who has a salary of only $1,400 or $1,500 or $2,000 per annum. I propose a limitation in this instance of 15 percent.

I think that no greater reduction should be made in the compensation being paid to veterans with service-connected disabilities than is being made in the case of salaries of officials who are so fortunate as to be drawing from the Government salaries of from eight to eighteen thousand dollars a year. If we permit a greater reduction than that, then, in many cases there will be taken from these veterans who in many instances are totally helpless, 25, 30, 40, or even 70 percent of the little compensation which they receive, which a grateful Nation owes them, regardless of what may be the opinion of a few people or of some Members of the Congress. It may be considered by some to be proper to take this larger percentage from the veterans, but when it comes to the question of endeavoring to cut down by, say, 25 percent or 30 percent salaries of ten, twelve, or fifteen thousand dollars, as was proposed in the amendment which I offered here previously on 2 or 3 occasions, it is said, "Oh, that is sacred; it would never do to reduce the salary of a man who is getting $15,000 a year more than a couple or three thousand dollars a year, anyway; it would never do to leave him a salary that was not at least $12,000 per annum."

The man who was receiving $10,000 per annum under an amendment proposed by me when the economy bill was pending would have had a $10,000 salary reduced approximately 25 percent. That amendment, however, was defeated. It was said it would never in the world do to take $2,500 a year from the salary of a man who was receiving $10,000 and leave him only $7,500 per annum. But as to these soldiers, these patriots who were wounded or contracted disease in fighting for their country, some people would not complain if we should take from them from 30 to 70 percent of their pitifully small compensation which the Government has heretofore been giving them. It is that condition which I seek to have corrected.

There are some who went mad on the question of economy, who were misled and deceived by the Economy League of America, the activities of which were carried on very largely by people who have never known much about the hardships of life; certainly at the time they were trying to bring about this maddening economy spirit in this country most of them were living in luxury, and many of them were receiving even large compensation from the Government. Nevertheless, their representations, carried on through chambers of commerce of the country and otherwise, had a great deal of weight with and deceived and misled a great many people. However, even in that campaign it was never intimated that its proponents wanted to make an attack upon the compensation allowed in service-connected cases.

Of course, I was not in sympathy with the policy advocated by the Economy League—that is, with the details of the program. I am in sympathy with the spirit of economy in this country; we need it; but with all the details of their program of economy I was never in agreement. They stood too much for getting the money barons of the country relieved from taxation and cared nothing for the little fellow.

So far as the Administration of Veterans Affairs and so far as Mr. Douglas are concerned, they seem to have selected a page out of the book of the members of the Economy League in applying reductions to the soldiers of the country. If Senators will read some of the literature of that organization regarding veterans they will see the similarity in the suggestions made by the Economy League and those which are now being applied.

Regardless of this propaganda, regardless of a public sentiment misled by misrepresentation of conditions, the people generally throughout the country, in my opinion, have become awakened to the situation; and, much as many Senators may be disgusted with what has been perpetrated upon our veterans in the name of economy, the public, generally speaking, are feeling the same as I do on this subject. I never meet or talk with anyone, whether he be humble in station or be high in station, whether he be in poverty or live in luxury; I never talk with anyone who dwells in the cottage or lives in the mansion—and I have talked with many in all walks of life on this subject—but that they disapprove of the way that thousands of veterans who served this country are being maltreated. As I hear the cry, it comes from the North and the South, the East and the West, and it is an appeal to Congress to remedy the situation and to correct a wrong and an injury which has been perpetrated upon these veterans of America. I am hopeful that this amendment will accomplish something in that direction. It involves only service-connected cases. It restricts reductions to 15 percent.

Another important feature, as I regard it, is that it protects the soldier who is already on the roll as a service-connected case from a reexamination and a review of his case, in that it provides that if such a thing shall be attempted, the burden of proof will be upon the Government.

As I gather it from letters which have come to my attention, the procedure under some of the regulations at the present time is that the Veterans' Administration is attempting to shift the burden of proof to the veteran to reestablish his case, which it has once recognized and acted upon favorably. What an injustice, what a tragedy it is to call upon these men whom I honor, and to whom I would have the Nation pay fitting tribute, again to reestablish their cases after they have been settled 1 year ago, 2 years ago, or 3 or 4 years ago, or maybe longer.

I could talk more at length, but I am not going to do so. I know how Senators generally feel. They feel that we should do something to correct the situation. My amendment will not correct all of the abuses which exist under the present regulations, but it will bring protection to the service-connected cases of the World War and of the Spanish-American War. It is thirty-odd years since the Spanish-American War. Those men cannot make proof now of service connection. One wrote me the other day that he had had only two comrades who could establish his case, one of whom is dead and the location of the other of whom he did not know, so he could not establish his service connection. That is typical of the situation portrayed in many letters I receive.

I notice that the Veterans' Administration, in quoting the President, said the President knew it would be unfair and unreasonable to require the Spanish-American War veterans to undertake to establish service disability and therefore that the Spanish-American War claims should be presumptively all service connected. I want to commend the President for that position and that generous and righteous attitude. I think that an administrative feature was tacked on by others to the President's very generous and just idea, and this administrative feature is that the bureau send out a blank to a veteran and ask all kinds of questions. Of course, he cannot establish through that blank the proof called for, although the President has said that his case would be presumtively service connected. He cannot now, 35 years after the Spanish-American War, establish service connection. They make the veteran, by such unjust procedure, become his own executioner. That is the trickery that is being practiced upon the Spanish-American War veteran. He becomes his own executioner because when he sends back that questionnaire he is unable to establish service connection. Therefore, when his case is reviewed, upon his own statement the generosity and fairness proposed by the President are brushed aside and disregarded, and his case is marked of nonservice connection because he has not been able to prove it again. It certainly is unreasonable to expect him to get the proof at this late day. As may be recalled, during the Spanish-American War very poor records were kept.

Where these men are already on the roll, they should be protected. Therefore in the amendment which I have offered I have provided that the compensation and pension shall not be reduced in excess of 15 percent. My first thought was 10 percent. That occurred to me as a proper recognition of the sentiment and the impulses that throb within me and impel me to honor, more than the civilian employees of the Government, those who have previously to these desperate, trying days of the Nation served their country in war.

I find some, but, of course, not many, who do not have much appreciation of that fact. They do not care much about a man's service to his country. They take the attitude that these men were paid when they served. But I would remind you they were paid a mere pittance in comparison with the service rendered. Some of these soldiers who have been mistreated under the regulations and by the action of the Veterans' Administration advise me in their communications that all during the war they sent insurance money and allowances to their families until they had nothing whatever left of the salary paid to them when they were upon the battlefield. Now, to meet with this disaster which has befallen them is very discouraging. Some of them write that it makes them feel that loyalty and patriotism and devotion to country are worth nothing; that they want no reward, but they do want some recognition for the services they rendered their Government.

Mr. President, I have submitted rather scattering remarks on the situation, but I hope I have made myself clear in my effort to bring to the attention of the Senate that under the regulations and the conduct of the Veterans' Administration the veterans—thousands of them, at least—with service-connected disabilities are being mistreated by a Government which should honor them and be just and generous with them.

It is said by some that these things will all be corrected. We have heard something similar before. When this matter was here originally in March we heard that everybody was going to be treated justly and generously. I do not care to delay longer in doing the best I can to correct the situation. I think the hour for action has arrived. I find that administrative officers, those who occupy executive positions and legislative positions, have to assert themselves at times to avoid or to have discontinued some injustice to groups of or all the American people.

When it was my good privilege and honor to be Governor of Florida, the legislature passed a bill providing for a tax commission. I was opposed to the policy, but the legislature passed the bill. There was a great sentiment in favor of it, so I said, "All right, we will have a tax commission for the purpose of equalizing taxes, but which, in my opinion, will be disappointing." I appointed the three commissioners. I said to them, "This law does not provide that you have to boost the tax assessments of Florida in a sum that will impose an unbearable tax burden upon the people of the State in any one year. My only instruction to you is to avoid doing that."

The first year they increased the tax assessment about 10 percent and got away with it. The next year an order was sent by the tax commission to the various tax assessors over the State, stating to each of the counties, respectively, "Your county shall increase its tax-assessment roll 40 percent"; to some other county, "You will increase your tax-assessment roll 50 percent"; another county, 25 percent; and in all it amounted to an average increase of 50 percent in taxation on the people of the State in 1 year. The law may have authorized this, but not the spirit of the law. I called the tax commissioners to my office and said, "I warned you about this. You are going to destroy the people of Florida by any such plan you have ordered as this. I am very sorry you did not talk to me about it first. I am going to wire every tax assessor in Florida to ignore your order and to make only a reasonable increase in the assessable values of the State." I pursued that course. The result was that the people were not burdened nor absolutely crushed under an unreasonable and disorderly effort to bring about tax equalization.

We need definite action now. I hope I may be pardoned for the reference to my own experience, but that is what we need with reference to the Veterans' Administration. If no one else will go after them, then it is the duty of Congress to go after them. I am not willing to wait any longer, Mr. President, so I have proposed this amendment and I hope Senators will support it. I am going to support some of the other good amendments that have been proposed by other Senators. The Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] has rather a similar amendment which he has proposed. Of course, I like the 15-percent idea better than 25 percent. I do not want to discriminate against ex-soldiers, because they have already been discriminated against too much. I do not want to make a reduction of more than 15 percent. The amendment of the Senator from New Mexico is a splendid amendment and carries out the same idea and purpose I have, except that it makes no provision with regard to the question that the burden of proof should be on the Government when they go to review a case already upon the rolls and which has previously been determined.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. CUTTING. I just wish to say that I am going to vote for the amendment of the Senator from Florida. I know there is some sentiment in the Chamber in favor of giving the President a little more latitude than the Senator proposes in his amendment. I merely want to serve notice now that if the Senator fails to get the necessary two-thirds vote to suspend the rule for the consideration of his amendment, then I shall call up my motion to have consideration of my amendment making a reduction of not to exceed 25 percent in the service-connected cases.

Mr. President, if the Senator will yield further, I should like to have printed in the RECORD an editorial from the Philadelphia Record entitled "Inhuman and Unsound."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Philadelphia Record, June 1, 1933]

INHUMAN AND UNSOUND

Revolt raises its head in Congress and in the Nation against the "economy" program of the Roosevelt administration.

The President himself, apparently realizing that conservative advisers have misled him, moves toward modification of the reductions for veterans.

Nothing can do Mr. Roosevelt more harm than to continue the balance-the-Budget program of the Hoover administration.

To attempt a balance at the present time, and at the expense of needy veterans and underpaid civil employees, is inhuman and unsound.

So conservative a commentator as Roger Babson warned the wealthy interests behind the National Economy League several months ago:

"Elimination of unemployment can come only by increasing public purchasing power and raising the standard of living. Only as more goods are bought and consumed can this country return to normal production and employment. All talk to the contrary is not only uneconomic but dangerous.

"Hence I appeal to the National Economy League to drop the word 'economy' and to curb their speakers in their preaching of false economy. In the meantime, until this is done, I advise manufacturers, merchants, and workers to refrain from joining the National Economy League."

The same wealthy banking and industrial interests behind the league do not hesitate to accept huge doles from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and from the Federal Government while asking cuts at the expense of veterans and workers.

How can business be revived when mass purchasing power is being curtailed?

Can business be expected to raise wages when the Federal Government itself is paying sweatshop rates to many in its own post offices?

How can it take bread and butter from the mouths of veterans and workers while it continues to pay huge subsidies, in one instance as high as $117,000 a pound, to Morgan air-lines companies for handling the mails?

The President's new deal is being wrecked and undermined by reactionary forces in his own official family.

The National Economy League and its heavily financed publicity men spread the impression that millions were being paid to veterans who neither needed nor deserved the money.

Such cases exist, without a doubt. That they are typical or even common the Record denies. Many badly in need, many with service records overseas, have been cut and cut drastically under the economy program.

In a Senate debate over the economy provisions Senator VANDENBERG, of Michigan, tells of one veteran with gunshot wounds in the back, hernia, arthritis, and chronic nervousness, all service connected, who has been reduced from $90 to $8 a month.

Let it be noted, also, that the most the National Economy League dared to ask for openly was reduction in payments to the non-service-connected disabled. Let it be noted that Mr. Hoover merely asked an 8⅓-percent cut for Federal workers, instead of the 15 percent obtained under President Roosevelt.

The narrow, bookkeeping minds of the Douglases have taken the Roosevelt administration further than even the worst reactionaries dared to go.

President Roosevelt is making a gigantic effort to wipe out the sweatshop and raise the wages of labor.

So far the Nation's great corporations have followed the example of his Budget-balancing underlings, instead of the President's own recommendations.

Great corporations such as United States Steel and Public Service of New Jersey were quick to imitate the 15-percent pay cut for Federal employees and the fallacious reasoning by which an attempt was made to justify the slash.

Sweatshop employers can still point to a Federal post office which exacts a 15-percent cut—against the intent of Congress—from postal substitutes trying to support families on $5 and $7 a week.

How are wages to be raised when 54 percent of the Federal Government's employees make less than $1,500 a year, far less than the minimum estimated as necessary to raise a family in health and decency?

The Record appeals to President Roosevelt to clean house of reactionary influences, to begin the new deal at Washington, to set an example of fair wages and decent conditions, to revoke the inhuman and uneconomic cuts for veterans.

No substantial business revival is possible until mass purchasing power is increased.

To act for an increase in that mass purchasing power is the President's duty to the masses who turned to him for relief last November.

The human way is still the only way out of this crisis. Aid to the needy is the best kind of aid to business. Only increased mass purchasing power will sustain the rise in prices needed to revive industry.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I make the point of order against the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] that it is legislation upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, of course, I think the point of order is in accordance with the rule, but I had hoped that the Senator in charge of the bill would show at least as much generosity toward human beings and the rights of our veterans as he has shown toward some other interests in permitting amendments that were clearly in violation of the rule to be attached to the measure without any objection whatever.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from South Carolina makes the point of order against the amendment of the Senator from Florida on the ground that it is legislation upon an appropriation bill. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. McNARY. I thought the pending question was the motion offered by the Senator from Florida to suspend the rule. If that is the motion, no Senator could accept it. It has to be by vote of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. On this particular amendment the Chair understands there is no motion to suspend the rule.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I desire to present the notice which I gave 2 or 3 days ago for suspension of the rule. I ask that the motion be considered and that the rule be suspended for the purpose of considering the amendment which I desire to offer.

I suggest the absence of a quorum. A number of Senators told me they wish to be here when this matter is voted upon.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold that suggestion a moment?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Certainly; I withdraw the suggestion for a moment.

Mr. McNARY. May I ask the Senator in charge of the bill if he desires to go forward further tonight; or can we not at this time recess until 11 o'clock tomorrow, and then take a vote on the Senator's motion?

Mr. BYRNES. I have no objection. The Senator from Oregon has indicated that a number of Senators on the other side of the Chamber desire to offer amendments; and if it is the desire to recess at this time—the Senator from Arkansas is now in the Chamber—I have no objection.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I wish to offer an amendment to the pending bill and have it printed and lie on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be printed and lie on the table.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I am reluctant to discontinue the proceedings this afternoon in view of the fact that no progress has been made on this bill today. It is true that other important matters have been disposed of.

There is on the calendar a joint resolution having relationship to the gold clause in contracts. This joint resolution should be acted upon tomorrow or next day for the convenience of the Treasury Department. It is well understood that there are some important transactions to be had at once by that Department; and I think that if we recess now, there ought to be an understanding that we will proceed to dispose of this appropriation bill at an early hour tomorrow, so that the Senate may go forward with other legislation.

Of course, no one disputes the importance of the subject matters that are receiving consideration; but it has seemed to me that during the course of this week considerable time has been consumed in the discussion of subjects that are not before the Senate—a very bad practice in most instances.

I should like to ask Senators to cooperate in an early disposition of this bill tomorrow, and in proceeding upon the joint resolution to which I have referred. It is a very late hour in the day to undertake to get action on these amendments. If I can have the assurance that we may hope for reasonably prompt action tomorrow, I shall move a recess now, particularly in view of the acceptance of the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon by the Senator in charge of the bill, with whom I am cooperating.

It is perfectly apparent that if this extra session is to conclude its labors within the limit that has been discussed, we will be under the necessity of holding night sessions, especially if Senators indulge the practice of talking about questions not before the Senate and talking at great length.

With that statement, and expressing the hope that we may make progress tomorrow, and with the understanding that if we find it necessary I shall do what I can to keep the Senate in session until action is taken, I ask the Senator from Oregon if he does not feel that he can cooperate to that end? I am willing to move a recess at this time if such an understanding can be reached.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I am extremely anxious, of course, as we all are on this side, to conclude this session by a week from Saturday. All we want is an opportunity to study and discuss the various measures. I feel sure that cooperation may be had on this side in order to expedite adjournment.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What I am particularly asking about now is with respect to the proceedings tomorrow, having stated the necessity for a little prompter action than seems to be assured.

Mr. McNARY. Of course I am not in position to speak concerning the time that will be occupied in the argument of various amendments.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand that.

Mr. McNARY. I know of no intention upon the part of anyone here to prolong discussion; and as far as I am personally concerned, I shall cooperate to bring about an expeditious consideration of the pending unfinished business.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I should like to have an understanding that we will proceed with this bill until it is finally disposed of tomorrow, and also try to make progress on the consideration of the joint resolution. Is that satisfactory?

Mr. McNARY. I could not speak for anyone other than myself with respect to that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am not asking unanimous consent.

Mr. McNARY. I know; but with regard to the joint resolution, I do not know what the feeling is here, whether it is desired to consider that measure or some other measure; but, whatever legislation is before the Senate, I shall cooperate to bring about an early decision of the matter.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I give notice that I shall request and urge the Senate to continue in session tomorrow until this bill is disposed of.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry. I desire to ask if my motion to suspend the rules is now the pending question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's motion is pending.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I thank the Chair.

INVESTIGATION OF PURCHASES OF EQUIPMENT FOR CIVILIAN CONSERVATION CORPS

Mr. CAREY. Mr. President, from the Committee on Military Affairs I report back favorably, with an amendment, Senate Resolution 88, and ask unanimous consent for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be read.

The legislative clerk read Senate Resolution 88, submitted by Mr. CAREY on May 26, 1933, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to investigate the negotiations between the Director of Emergency Conservation Work and the BeVier Corporation, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of New York, with respect to a contract proposed to be entered into between the Director and such corporation for the purchase of toilet kits to be furnished as part of the equipment of members of the Civilian Conservation Corps. The committee is also authorized in its discretion to investigate reports of irregularities in connection with any other purchases or proposed purchases of materials or equipment for the use of the Civilian Conservation Corps by any department, agency, or officer of the United States Government.

The committee shall report to the Senate as soon as practicable the results of its investigations, together with its recommendations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I understand that the report of the committee is unanimous.

Mr. CAREY. It is.

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the committee will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 1, the committee proposes to strike out lines 10 to 14, both inclusive, in the following words:

The committee is also authorized in its discretion to investigate reports of irregularities in connection with any other purchases or proposed purchases of materials or equipment for the use of the Civilian Conservation Corps by any department, agency, or officer of the United States Government.

The amendment was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs, or any duly authorized subcommittee thereof, is authorized and directed to investigate the negotiations between the Director of Emergency Conservation Work and the BeVier Corporation, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of New York, with respect to a contract proposed to be entered into between the Director and such corporation for the purchase of toilet kits to be furnished as part of the equipment of members of the Civilian Conservation Corps. The committee shall report to the Senate as soon as practicable the results of its investigations, together with its recommendations.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, in view of the lateness of the hour and the fact that it probably would take some time to secure a quorum, I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 5 o'clock and 37 minutes p.m.) the Senate took a recess until tomorrow, Friday, June 2, 1933, at 11 o'clock a.m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, JUNE 1, 1933

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. William Pierpoint, pastor of McKendree Methodist Episcopal Church, Washington, D.C., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, Thou giver of life and light, grant unto us that light which will make us wise in that wisdom and understanding which expresses itself in righteousness and truth. By the endowment of Thy spirit may we be fitted for the great and grave responsibilities which rest upon us. Help us to remember always that it is man's chief duty to glorify God. We believe we best discharge that duty when we seek to serve well our day and generation. To this end may that which we do be done as unto Thee.

O Lord, be pleased to let Thy gracious presence abide with us. Thou art our God; in Thee do we trust. Our rich heritage is from Thee. Our countless blessings are the evidence of Thy bounteous goodness toward us. Grant unto us, we beseech Thee, a continuance of Thy favor. Lift up the light of Thy countenance upon us and grant us Thy peace, that all our works, begun, continued, and ended in Thee, may be for the conservation of our national welfare, the promotion of universal peace among the nations of the earth, and the establishing of Thy kingdom among our fellow men. Hear us, we pray, for Christ, the Redeemer's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Horne, its enrolling clerk, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendments of the House to the joint resolution (S.J.Res. 48) authorizing the Secretary of War to receive for instruction at the United States Military Academy at West Point, Posheng Yen, a citizen of China.

MODIFICATION OF POSTAGE RATES AND EXTENSION OF GASOLINE TAX

Mr. DOUGHTON submitted the following conference report on the bill (H.R. 5040) to extend the gasoline tax for 1 year, to modify postage rates on mail matter, and for other purposes:

CONFERENCE REPORT

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 5040) to extend the gasoline tax for 1 year, to modify postage rates on mail matter, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1 and 2, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 3: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 3, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the Senate amendment insert the following:

"SEC. 6. (a) Effective September 1, 1933, section 616 of the Revenue Act of 1932 is amended to read as follows:

"'SEC. 616. TAX ON ELECTRICAL ENERGY FOR DOMESTIC OR COMMERCIAL CONSUMPTION

"'(a) There is hereby imposed upon electrical energy sold for domestic or commercial consumption and not for resale a tax equivalent to 3 percent of the price for which so sold, to be paid by the vendor under such rules and regulations as the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, shall prescribe. The sale of electrical energy to an owner or lessee of a building, who purchases such electrical energy for resale to the tenants therein, shall for the purposes of this section be considered as a sale for consumption and not for resale, but the resale to the tenant shall not be considered a sale for consumption.

"'(b) The provisions of sections 619, 622, and 625 shall not be applicable with respect to the tax imposed by this section.

"'(c) No tax shall be imposed under this section upon electrical energy sold to the United States or to any State or Territory, or political subdivision thereof, or the District of Columbia. The right to exemption under this subsection shall be evidenced in such manner as the Commissioner, with the approval of the Secretary, may by regulation prescribe.'

"(b) Despite the provisions of this section the tax imposed under section 616 of the Revenue Act of 1932 before its amendment by this section on electrical energy furnished before September 1, 1933, shall be imposed, collected, and paid in the same manner and shall be subject to the same provisions of law (including penalties) as if this section had not been enacted."

And the Senate agree to the same.

STATEMENT

The managers on the part of the House at the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H.R. 5040) to extend the gasoline tax for 1 year, to modify postage rates on mail matter, and for other purposes, submit the following written statement in explanation of the effect of the action agreed upon by the conferees and recommended in the accompanying conference report:

On amendment no. 1: This amendment strikes out the phrase "for experimental purposes" in the provisions relating to the elimination on July 1, 1933, of the additional rate on first-class matter mailed for local delivery. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 2: This amendment strikes out the provision of the House bill which transfers the electrical-energy tax from the producer to the consumer and substitutes in lieu thereof a provision which exempts from taxation under the manufacturers' excise-tax title of the Revenue Act of 1932 articles sold for use as fuel supplies, ships' stores, sea stores, or legitimate equipment on vessels of war, fishing or whaling vessels, or vessels engaged in foreign trade, trade between the Atlantic or Pacific ports of the United States, or between the United States and its possessions. The amendment also provides that articles manufactured or produced with the use of articles upon which the tax under the manufacturers' excise tax title has been paid upon importation, if laden as supplies on such vessels, shall be held to be exported for the purposes of allowance of drawback on such articles. The House recedes.

On amendment no. 3: This amendment imposes a tax on electrical energy sold on or after September 1, 1933, for domestic or commercial consumption of 2 percent of the price for which sold. This tax is to be paid by the vendor. No tax is to be imposed on the sale of such energy to the United States or to any State, Territory, or political subdivision thereof, or the District of Columbia.

The amendment also imposes a tax (with certain exemptions) of 1 percent of the amount paid for electrical energy for consumption other than domestic or commercial if such energy is furnished on or after September 1, 1933, and before July 1, 1934. This tax is to be paid by the person paying for such electrical energy and is to be collected by the vendor.

The amendment further provides that the provisions relating to both the tax on the vendor and the tax on the vendee shall not apply to publicly owned electric and power plants.

The amendment further provides that the tax under existing law on the payment for electrical energy for domestic or commercial consumption shall apply with respect to payment on or after September 1, 1933, for electrical energy furnished before that date.

The House recedes with an amendment imposing a tax on the vendor of 3 per centum of the price for which electrical energy is sold for domestic or commercial consumption, effective September 1, 1933, rather than the fifteenth day after the enactment of the act as proposed by the House. The amendment continues the present tax on the consumer until September 1 with appropriate provision for collection of tax on payments made on or after September 1 for electrical energy furnished before that date. The amendment omits the provision of the Senate amendment imposing a tax on the consumer of industrial energy. The section as agreed to in conference also omits the Senate amendment exempting publicly owned electric and power plants. The section as agreed to in conference also provides that in the case of electrical energy sold to an owner or lessee of a building for resale to his tenants the tax shall not be paid by the owner or lessee but by his vendor.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by inserting in the RECORD the number of men, by classes, who will be employed in supervising the work of the 274,375 registrants for reforestation work.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to ask the gentleman a question or two. I would like to know how many civilian employees there are in connection with this supervisory work.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Independent of the Indians to be placed in reforestation, this list shows a total of 20,300 civilian employees but this number does not include the Regular Army officers, Navy officers, and the Reserve officers.

Mr. SNELL. What is the average pay of these civilians?

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Looking over this list I imagine that the average pay of these 20,300 men will be around $140 per month.

Mr. SNELL. How many Army officers are connected with the reforestation work?

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. I have not the number but I hope later to get it, and if I do I will insert it in the RECORD. I understand the Reserve officers will number about 5,000.

Mr. SNELL. I think it is valuable information. If we are going to have any, we ought to have it all.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. I will insert also the number of Reserve officers employed in this work if I can get their number in larger detail.

Mr. SNELL. Also, I would like to know how many emergency officers have been called back into service.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. I will undertake to supply this information.

Mr. SNELL. It has been rumored around that these men recruited in the eastern part of the United States are sent to the very western part and are transported in Pullman cars. Is this so?

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. I understand a large number of them have been transported in Pullman cars, particularly from Fort Slocum to Idaho.

Mr. SNELL. What is going to be the average cost for each man by the time we get through? Has the gentleman from Mississippi any information on this question?

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. When this bill was originally on the floor of the House I estimated the cost of each one of these recruits at $3.66 per day. I understand my estimate was low and the cost per day for each recruit will be in excess of that amount.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman put all of this information in any report he files?

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. I shall be pleased to give the gentleman all the information I can.

Mr. SNELL. If the gentleman will do that, I shall have no objection to his request.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, has the gentleman any information as to the number of Indians employed? Is he going to include that information in his extension of remarks?

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. I shall undertake to do so.

Mr. SNELL. There is one further question I would like to ask the gentleman from Mississippi. Has it been necessary for the Government to purchase any land for the location of these camps; and, if so, at what price?

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. I understand that $20,000,000 has been set aside for the purchase of land?

Mr. SNELL. When this matter was originally proposed did the gentleman understand that any such sum of money was going to be set aside for the purchase of land?

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. I did not know that any land would be purchased, and I do not believe the Congress contemplated any purchases of land. I doubt the wisdom of such action.

Mr. SNELL. What authority is there for the purchase of land?

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. Reading the Executive order on the subject, the authority seems to be based upon the provisions of the act entitled "An act for the relief of unemployment through performance of useful public work and for other purposes."

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman think the authority goes to the extent of spending $20,000,000 for temporary camp sites?

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. It has been held so by the Executive. I have a copy of the Executive order dated May 20 authorizing out of that appropriation the expenditure of $20,000,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, will my colleague from Mississippi yield?

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I was just wondering whether our distinguished minority leader voted for that bill. Did the gentleman vote for it?

Mr. SNELL. If I did, I made a mistake, I will tell the gentleman that.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. There was no roll call on the bill. It is difficult to tell how any one voted.

Mr. BLANTON. I did not hear the usual very vigorous and able voice of the great minority leader [Mr. SNELL] fighting anything about that bill.

Mr. SNELL. If there is one thing that has absolutely disappointed the American people it is this reforestation proposition, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. BLANTON. Then the gentleman made a mistake.

Mr. SNELL. I have made more than one mistake.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think my leader, for once, has gone wrong upon this reforestation policy—the only time I ever knew him to make a serious mistake.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, then, he must have made a mistake, both coming and going.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. I believe the national reforestation policy has been one of the finest, most constructive, and outstanding pieces of work that ever was enacted into law, and the gentleman from New York, Mr. CLARKE, had a hand in it. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. But, according to the statements of both gentlemen from New York, the minority leader made a mistake, both coming and going.

Mr. SNELL. Well, the gentleman from Texas has made a couple of mistakes himself.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wish to ask the gentleman from Mississippi a question.

As I understand it, either today or tomorrow, in order to meet these terrific expenses that we have been pulling off, there will be advertised a bond issue of from $600,000,000 to $1,000,000,000. Has the gentleman any information as to that situation?

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. No; I have no information on that subject, I regret to say.

Mr. TABER. The bids for this bond issue are returnable on the 22d of June. The gentleman understands, of course, that such a thing is deflationary.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. I am sorry I do not have the information for the gentleman.

Mr. TABER. And as these bonds are issued, we will have to have another shot in the arm of inflation, and this will keep on month after month.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, until we can get the Republican leadership together, I ask for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

Mr. COLLINS of Mississippi. The matter referred to is as follows:

H.R. 4544—EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. STUBBS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a copy of a joint resolution adopted by the General Assembly of the State of California. The petition has been filed, but I would like to have the words of the petition inserted in the RECORD. It is very brief and will only occupy about a half column of the RECORD. It has to do with a bill which I have introduced, H.R. 4544.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD, as indicated. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The joint resolution is as follows:

STATE OF CALIFORNIA,
DEPARTMENT OF STATE.

I, Frank C. Jordan, Secretary of State of the State of California, do hereby certify that I have carefully compared the transcript, to which this certificate is attached, with the record on file in my office of which it purports to be a copy, and that the same is a full, true, and correct copy thereof. I further certify that this authentication is in due form and by the proper officer.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and have caused the great seal of the State of California to be affixed hereto this 26th day of May 1933.

Assembly Joint Resolution 29, relative to memorializing Congress to enact legislation prohibiting the importation of crude petroleum and crude petroleum byproducts

Whereas the oil industry not only of this State but of other States in the United States has found it necessary to curtail production of crude petroleum and the byproducts thereof; and

Whereas the petroleum industry is one of the major industries of California and is vital to the welfare of this State and its citizens; and

Whereas one of the reasons it has been necessary to so curtail the production in this State, thereby preventing many of our citizens from obtaining a livelihood, is that crude petroleum and crude petroleum products are being imported into this country; and

Whereas the prohibition of such importation would foster the petroleum industry in this State and, by furnishing employment to thousands of our citizens, thereby substantially contribute to the termination of the present economic depression; and

Whereas the Honorable Henry E. Stubbs has introduced in the Congress of the United States a measure, numbered H.R. 4544, which will forbid the importation of crude petroleum and crude petroleum byproducts, which measure has been referred to the Committee on Ways and Means in the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Assembly and the Senate of the State of California, jointly, That the Legislature of the State of California most respectfully urges the Congress of the United States to enact H.R. 4544; and be it further

Resolved, That His Excellency the Governor of the State of California be requested to transmit copies of this resolution to the President and Vice President of the United States, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, to the Chairman of the Committee on Ways and Means of the House of Representatives, and to the Senators and Representatives from California in Congress.

WALTER J. LITTLE,
Speaker of the Assembly.
FRANK F. MERRIAM,
President of the Senate.

ADMINISTERING OF OATHS BY MEMBERS OF INTERNATIONAL TRIBUNALS

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Rules has unanimously voted out a rule for the consideration of the bill (S. 1581) to amend the act approved July 3, 1930 (46 Stat. 1005), authorizing commissioners or members of international tribunals to administer oaths, and so forth. After conference with the minority members of the Rules Committee, in order to save time, I ask unanimous consent that instead of calling up the rule, we may have the privilege of considering this bill in the House, under the general rules of the House.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, unless the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] is permitted to address the House for 15 minutes, I shall object.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In reply to that statement I may say that the majority leader has had a conference with the gentleman from Massachusetts and I think a satisfactory arrangement has been made.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will the gentleman assure us that this has been arranged?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It has been arranged, so far as the majority leader can arrange it.

Mr. BYRNS. And I hope no one will object to the gentleman's request when it is submitted.

Mr. McFADDEN. I know nothing about any private arrangement. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] be permitted to address the House for 15 minutes; otherwise I shall object.

Mr. BYRNS. I have an agreement with the gentleman, and certainly the gentleman from Massachusetts will be permitted to control his own actions.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will not the gentleman present the request to the House at this time?

Mr. BYRNS. I have an agreement with the gentleman from Massachusetts, and certainly he knows what he wants to do.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman knows very well that he cannot control the Membership of this House.

Mr. BYRNS. Let me get through with my statement, if you please. After these rules are disposed of, the gentleman from Massachusetts will ask unanimous consent to speak for 20 minutes, and I hope no one on this side of the House will object.

Mr. McFADDEN. Will not the gentleman submit the request?

Mr. BLANTON. And the gentleman from Pennsylvania ought to realize that the Democrats on this side of the aisle follow their leaders. [Laughter.]

Mr. SNELL. As a matter of fact, I can say to the gentleman that they did not follow him yesterday.

Mr. BYRNS. Of course, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MCFADDEN] realizes that if he objects to this request, he will be pursuing a course that may prevent the gentleman from Massachusetts making the speech.

Mr. McFADDEN. Unless the majority leader submits the request and gets such permission, I shall object.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PURCHASE OF PREFERRED STOCK OR BONDS OF INSURANCE COMPANIES

Mr. STEAGALL presented a conference report on the bill (S. 1094) to provide for the purchase by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of the preferred stock and/or bonds and/or debentures of insurance companies.

ADMINISTRATION OF OATHS BY MEMBERS OF INTERNATIONAL TRIBUNALS

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the Committee on Rules I call up the resolution H.Res. 168.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for consideration of S. 1581, a bill to amend the act approved July 3, 1930 (46 Stat. 1005), authorizing commissioners or members of international tribunals to administer oaths, etc. After general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and shall continue not to exceed 40 minutes, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on the Judiciary, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of the reading of the bill for amendment the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I have no inclination or, indeed, the strength this morning to make any extended statement with reference to the provisions of this rule or the Senate bill for which it provides consideration. This will be fully explained by the Chairman or the Acting Chairman of the Judiciary Committee.

This is a bill that originated in the Senate and passed the Senate unanimously a few days ago upon the urgent recommendation of the Secretary of State and also a representative of American interests on the German Claims Commission.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman tell me what committee it was referred to in the Senate?

Mr. BANKHEAD. I regret that I cannot give the gentleman that information.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman states it was recommended by the Secretary of State. Should it not have come to the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House?

Mr. BANKHEAD. It relates purely to judicial procedure, I may say to the gentleman, and that is the reason it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FISH. But it was recommended by the Secretary of State.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It was recommended by the Secretary of State and it was introduced by the Chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and with his permission, and I presume at his request, it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

As I stated, it is a very brief and simple proposition. It was unanimously reported by the Committee on the Judiciary, and after hearing the parties the Rules Committee has unanimously reported the rule for its consideration.

The substance of the bill merely provides for the use of the auspices of the United States district court in order to give the American citizens who have claims before the Mixed Claims Commission the same authority that the German citizens have to present their evidence, which has heretofore been denied them before the Commission.

I trust there will be no opposition to the bill when it is explained, and that it may have the unanimous support of the House. There is no partisanship involved in it. It is merely an effort to protect legitimate claims of American citizens who have claims before the Mixed Claims Commission.

Unless there is some desire for time on the rule——

Mr. RANSLEY. Let me say to the gentleman that there is no demand for time on this side of the aisle. It is an open rule, and no opposition.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering S. 1581, to amend the act approved July 3, 1930 (46 Stat. 1005), authorizing commissioners or members of international tribunals to administer oaths, and so forth.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. JONES in the chair.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Committee, I will try to explain the bill in less time than the 20 minutes allotted to me. I will give you a short explanation of the bill, and then will try to answer questions that may be asked me in further explanation of the bill.

The American agents representing the Government before the German Mixed Claims Commission, dealing with claims, found themselves at a definite disadvantage in trying to prepare their cases for trial. We had not given to our agent any power to take testimony. That is a practical statement of the facts.

When they sought the right to take oral testimony the Commission held that they had not been given the authority to authorize the taking of testimony in that way, and that if the Commission were to attempt to grant the requested authority it would be acting beyond the power given them in the treaty between this Government and Germany creating the Commission.

The German Government has given the power to their agent which, by this bill, is being given to our agent—power to take testimony in the preparation of their cases.

So you see the situation we are in. We have to have this authority in order to place ourselves on an equal footing with Germany.

There was no objection in the Senate Judiciary Committee. The bill passed the Senate unanimously and was reported by the Judiciary Committee of the House unanimously.

There is a good deal of evidence I could offer, and much more could be said in explanation, but realizing the necessity is obvious I do not feel that I should take up further time of the House in explanation.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. As I understand from the statement of the gentleman, our attorneys or agents have not the same privilege in preparing their cases that the Germans have.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is correct.

Mr. SNELL. This is simply to put them on a par with the Germans in preparing cases to be presented before the Mixed Claims Commission?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. That is correct.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. This bill provides for commissioners or members of international tribunals to administer oaths. Is that authority confined entirely to the question of war claims?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Will the gentleman direct my attention to the particular language he has in mind?

Mr. McFADDEN. It is on line 4, page 1, of the bill, and the language authorizes commissioners or members of international tribunals to administer oaths. What I want to know is whether or not that will commission people who are connected with the League of Nations and the World Court to administer oaths and compel American witnesses to furnish information to those organizations.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from Texas yield to me——

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. McKEOWN. To say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that he is referring to the matter of the bill as it was. That is what we are trying to amend.

Mr. McFADDEN. That is the law now?

Mr. McKEOWN. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. And this does not grant any additional authority?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Not on that point.

Mr. McFADDEN. To people who might be sent abroad to administer oaths and compel Americans here to furnish testimony in connection with diplomatic matters.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. No.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman can assure us it does not involve that kind of a transaction?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I was thinking of the question in the light of this proposed legislation. This proposed legislation begins with section 5.

Mr. McFADDEN. Let me say to the gentleman further, in illustration of what I am driving at, that the French Government is preparing to present four or five billion dollars' worth of claims against the United States when the United States becomes a member of the World Court, and I want to know whether or not officers or supposed representatives of the United States over there can subpena Americans to substantiate their claims if and when that takes place.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. If we may assume that this Government becomes a member of the World Court, this legislation would merely give to our representatives, where property interests are involved, the same power to take testimony as other governments have given to their representatives, and nothing more.

Mr. McFADDEN. The gentleman can see the importance of what I am mentioning?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I can.

Mr. McFADDEN. If and when we join the World Court, international law will bring us into that Court; and I am against our ever entering the World Court, where those French claims will be presented.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. McFADDEN. The United States would be at a tremendous disadvantage, and I want to make sure that this is not any authority that will permit that.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. This authority is given merely to the American agent in those cases where there is a conflict between governments in their own behalf or between governments representing their nationals, and provides that the representative of the American Government shall have the same authority to prepare his case for trial as have the agents of foreign governments.

Mr. McFADDEN. What I want to be assured of most particularly is that if and when the United States should be drawn into the World Court, which I am very much opposed to—and the United States has an unofficial representative abroad of the type of Norman H. Davis, who is a well-known internationalist—I do not want such representatives as he to force Americans to give testimony which might be detrimental to the best interests of the people of the United States.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I can only repeat myself, that this is merely giving authority to the agent of the Government to take testimony and to be equally as well prepared as his opponent is when the case comes to trial before the Commission.

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. HOOPER. It is merely the matching of the power upon the part of members of our Commission that members of a foreign commission have in procedure?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes; and I appreciate my friend's statement, because perhaps he can get by with it.

I have stated it four or five times, but it does not seem to stick. Unless somebody else wants to ask questions, I suggest the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KURTZ] use some of his time.

Mr. KURTZ. Mr. Chairman, as I understand the attitude of this side of the House, it agrees with the majority in every particular. There was no dissenting voice before the committee in reference to this legislation, and it in no way applies to the League of Nations. It merely permits the people of America to have the same rights in commissions that the people of a foreign nation have, and with this bill unpassed we do not have that privilege. Therefore, the members of the minority on the Judiciary Committee are unanimous in favoring the passage of this bill in its present form. I yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act of July 3, 1930 (46 Stat. 1005), authorizing commissioners or members of international tribunals to administer oaths, and so forth, be, and the same is hereby, amended by adding at the end thereof the following additional sections:

"SEC. 5. That the agent of the United States before any international tribunal or commission, whether previously or hereafter established, in which the United States participates as a party whenever he desires to obtain testimony or the production of books and papers by witnesses may apply to the United States district court for the district in which such witness or witnesses reside or may be found, for the issuance of subpenas to require their attendance and testimony before the United States district court for that district and the production therein of books and papers, relating to any matter or claim in which the United States on its own behalf or on behalf of any of its nationals is concerned as a party claimant or respondent before such international tribunal or commission.

"SEC. 6. That any United States district court to which such application shall be made shall have authority to issue or cause to be issued such subpenas upon the same terms as are applicable to the issuance of subpenas in suits pending in the United States district court, and the clerk thereof shall have authority to administer oaths respecting testimony given therein, and the marshal thereof shall serve such subpenas upon the person or persons to whom they are directed. The hearing of witnesses and taking of their testimony and the production of books and papers pursuant to such subpenas shall be before the United States district court for that district or before a commissioner or referee appointed by it for the taking of such testimony, and the examination may be oral or upon written interrogatories and may be conducted by the agent of the United States or his representative. Reasonable notice thereof shall be given to the agent or agents of the opposing government or governments concerned in such proceedings who shall have the right to be present in person or by representative and to examine or cross-examine such witnesses at such hearing. A certified transcript of such testimony and any proceedings arising out of the issuance of such subpenas shall be forwarded by the clerk of the district court to the agent of the United States and also to the agent or agents of the opposing government or governments without cost.

"SEC. 7. That every person knowingly or willfully swearing or affirming falsely in any testimony taken in response to such subpenas shall be deemed guilty of perjury, and shall, upon conviction thereof, suffer the penalty provided by the laws of the United States for that offense when committed in its courts of justice. Any failure to attend and testify as a witness or to produce any book or paper which is in the possession or control of such witness, pursuant to such subpena, may be regarded as a contempt of the court and shall be punishable as a contempt by the United States district court in the same manner as is provided by the laws of the United States for that offense in any other proceedings in its courts of justice.

"SEC. 8. For the purposes of sections 5, 6, and 7 of this act, the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia shall be considered to be a district court of the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the Committee automatically rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. JONES, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill S. 1581, and pursuant to House Resolution No. 168, he reported the bill back to the House.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, the previous question is ordered.

The question is on the third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time and was read the third time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the passage of the bill.

The bill was passed.

On motion by Mr. MCKEOWN, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

NATIONAL EMPLOYMENT SYSTEM

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, I call up the resolution, H.Res. 157, a privileged resolution, with an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 157

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of H.R. 4559, entitled "A bill to provide for the establishment of a national employment system and for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such system, and for other purposes", and all points of order are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 3 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the Chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Labor, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. At the conclusion of such consideration the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and the previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and the amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

With the following amendment:

On page 1, line 10, strike out the word "three" and insert in lieu thereof the word "two."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve a point of order just for the purpose of getting some information.

From what committee does this bill come?

Mr. O'CONNOR. From the Committee on Labor.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it a unanimous report?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I understand so.

Mr. BLANTON. Is this a bill that was sent here by the President?

Mr. PEYSER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The President sent it here?

Mr. PEYSER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. This has not only the approval of the President but it is the expressed wish of the President that it pass?

Mr. PEYSER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I withdraw the reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, this rule provides for the consideration of the House bill, H.R. 4559, introduced by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PEYSER], and reported by the Committee on Labor of the House in a report filed by the chairman of that committee, Mr. CONNERY. I understand, however, there is a Senate bill on the desk practically identical which it is desired should be considered.

I move to amend the rule, Mr. Speaker, in line 4, by striking out "H.R. 4559" and inserting "S. 510", and by striking out the words "a bill" and inserting the words "an act."

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment by Mr. O'CONNOR: Page 1, line 4, strike out "H.R. 4559" and insert in lieu thereof "S. 510"; in the same line, on the same page, strike out the words "a bill" and insert in lieu thereof the words "an act."

Mr. GOSS. Is the Senate bill identically the same?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Not quite. It is practically the same.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman explain what the differences are?

Mr. O'CONNOR. In reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. MARTIN] and also the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. GOSS] the differences between the bills will be met by amendments offered by the Committee on Labor. The House committee put some amendments on the Wagner bill, and they propose now to consider the Wagner bill and offer amendments which they want adopted to the Wagner bill in the House.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. O'CONNOR. Yes; I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Will the veterans' employment offices be in the bill with the amendment which the committee will offer?

Mr. O'CONNOR. They will be maintained separately, I understand.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. They are desperately needed at this time.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR].

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Mr. Speaker, by the passage of this resolution we will accomplish what we tried to accomplish in the last Congress. As Members of the House who were Members of that Congress will recall, the House and Senate passed the so-called "Wagner employment bill" (S. 150), but it was vetoed by pocket veto by President Hoover. This bill sets up Federal employment agencies to work in cooperation with the State agencies, and grants aid to State agencies which do cooperate. The veterans' employment agencies now maintained by the Federal Government will be maintained separately for the veterans.

There is an authorization of an approprition of $1,500,000 for the coming fiscal year and $4,000,000 for each of the 4 years thereafter.

The House, after thorough consideration in the last Congress, enthusiastically supported the Wagner bill as one of the best methods of obtaining employment for the unemployed of America, and I am sure that spirit still prevails in this House, and that the House will again pass this employment agency bill.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I yield.

Mr. DOWELL. In what respect does the present bill differ from the bill that passed in the House at the last session?

Mr. O'CONNOR. I understand one of the two amendments that will be offered pertains to the veterans' employment agencies, and the other, as I understand, pertains to giving the States an opportunity to cooperate, but if they do not cooperate within a certain time the aid will be withdrawn from them.

Mr. DOWELL. As I understand the gentleman, the veterans' department will be separate from the other department in the legislation?

Mr. O'CONNOR. So I understand.

Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 510) to provide for the establishment of a national employment system and for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such system, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 510, with Mr. HASTINGS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, this bill is what was known originally as the Wagner bill. It is the bill which passed the Senate and the House during the last session of Congress and was vetoed by President Hoover.

This is a bill to provide for the establishment of a national employment system throughout the States and for cooperation with the States in the promotion of this system. In other words, the States are to be given an opportunity to cooperate with the Federal Government in this employment measure.

The Secretary of Labor lately closed all of the Federal employment offices except the veterans' offices. This bill will start a new system of cooperation with the States. The States will have an opportunity to save their own offices with aid from the Federal Government in these offices.

There has been a duplication of this work and that is the main reason they would like to do away with the Federal offices as such and cooperate with the States, making the offices combined Federal and State offices.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Are we to understand, then, that every employment office must have State contribution in order to be maintained.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. There will be no office where the Federal Government will bear the entire expense?

Mr. CONNERY. No. In future offices the States will contribute toward their establishment and they will be combined Federal and State offices.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. And the procedure, if any of these offices should close would be for application to reestablish the office to be made to the State authorities.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes. We have made an exemption here. We have put in a committee amendment in reference to the veterans. We have provided that the veterans' offices must be kept up in every State where there is an employment office. We feel that the veterans' problem is different from the general unemployment problem.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Must the States subscribe to the veterans' offices or will they be maintained by Federal appropriations?

Mr. CONNERY. They will be maintained by Federal appropriations.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I understand also that a veteran must be appointed as the head of a veterans' employment office, and also that everyone employed in the office must be a veteran or a relative of a veteran.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; the committee amendment so provides.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Thus, it will mean more work for the veterans. They need work desperately at this time.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes. We feel that the veterans' problem is different from the ordinary employment problem and that a veteran would be a little more interested in getting his "buddy" a job. We have provided that in these veteran employment offices in the States the director must be a veteran.

We found from the hearings and experience in the past that in many cases an employer did not want to hire a veteran because he figured the veteran may have been gassed or disabled and could not do the work as well as somebody else. So we have provided that a "buddy" will be in charge of the veterans' office, feeling that he will be more interested in securing work for his comrades than a man who is not a veteran.

Mr. DOWELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. DOWELL. In the matter of the cooperation of the several States we assume, of course, that all the States will cooperate. How is the division of expenditure to be made as between the Federal Government and the States?

Mr. CONNERY. The bill provides that no payment shall be made in any year out of the amount of such appropriations apportioned to any State until an equal sum has been appropriated or otherwise made available for that year by the State.

Mr. DOWELL. In other words, if the State does not make provision for the taking care of unemployment the Government does not open an office in that State?

Mr. CONNERY. We have a provision to take care of that also, reading as follows:

During the current fiscal year and the 2 succeeding fiscal years the Director is authorized to expend in any State so much of the sum apportioned to such State according to population, and so much of the unapportioned balance of the appropriation made under the provisions of section 5 as he may deem necessary, as follows:

(a) In States where there is no State system of public employment offices, in establishing and maintaining a system of public employment offices under the control of the Director.

(b) In States where there is a State system of public employment offices, but where the State has not complied with the provisions of section 4, in establishing a cooperate Federal and State system of public employment offices to be maintained by such officer or board and in such manner as may be agreed upon by and between the Governor of the State and the Director.

The authority contained in this section shall terminate at the expiration of the period specified in the first paragraph of this section, and thereafter no assistance shall be rendered such States until the legislatures thereof provide for cooperation with the United States Employment Service as provided in section 4 of this act.

In other words, some of these legislatures do not meet until 2 years from now and we did not want any of these States to be deprived of an employment office for 2 years, or until their legislatures met, knowing they would be willing to cooperate with the Federal Government in contributing to the expense of this proposition.

Mr. DOWELL. In other words, the Federal Government takes care of the situation until the States have the opportunity to take care of it.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. DOWELL. But the veterans' department, however, is maintained by the Government and continues from the passage of the act?

Mr. CONNERY. That is maintained by the Federal Government.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON of Texas. Is this measure substantially the same as the bill known as the "Wagner bill" which was vetoed by President Hoover?

Mr. CONNERY. It is.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield at this point?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. ARNOLD. I wish the gentleman would give us some idea as to the personnel and salary set-up in each of these agencies.

Mr. CONNERY. If my memory serves me right, I think the director in the State offices got about $3,000 a year. Then we cut them down. I think the highest salary paid was $4,000 a year in some States.

Then we cut them down to $3,200 or $3,000.

Mr. ARNOLD. What is the number of the personnel?

Mr. CONNERY. Some offices have 2, some 3, and some 4. It depends on the population of the State or the condition in the city where the offices are opened.

Mr. ARNOLD. Can the gentleman advise us how much per annum it will take to run each one of these offices, approximately?

Mr. CONNERY. They gave us some figures about that in the hearings; and if my memory serves me right, the total cost was around $250,000.

Mr. PEYSER. If the gentleman will yield, I think I can answer that question.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PEYSER], the author of the bill, to answer the gentleman.

Mr. PEYSER. The entire appropriation in connection with the service which has been maintained, it was shown in the hearings, was about $978,000, of which seven hundred and some odd thousand dollars was used for salaries in the Washington offices. So there was very little used in the offices throughout the country, which is evidently the reason they are disposing of them. They were not functioning properly, and the hearings also brought out that the veterans' offices are maintained at about $8,000 per office per year. They maintain 30 offices, which it was shown cost about $250,000 to keep up.

Mr. ARNOLD. I thank the gentleman for the information.

Mr. CONNERY. In further answer to the gentleman there are 30 offices in which the manager gets $2,200 or $2,000, and there are 22 of these managers getting $2,400. It was $3,000 and we cut them down to this amount.

Mr. ARNOLD. That is the information I wanted, and I thank the gentleman.

Mr. GRANFIELD. Will my distinguished colleague from Massachusetts yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. GRANFIELD. As I understand the gentleman's statement, this bill is substantially the same as the Wagner bill which passed both branches of the Congress about a year ago.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. GRANFIELD. And it was pocket-vetoed by President Hoover.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mr. GRANFIELD. My recollection is that at that time President Hoover stated the employment service in this country was adequate. What are the reasons for bringing in this resolution now if the employment service under the last administration operated properly and met the needs of the country?

Mr. CONNERY. The employment system under the last administration was not adequate—not only that, but it did not function. Many of these employment offices should have been abolished long ago because they did not do the work. They could not cooperate with the States. They were duplicating the functions of employment offices in the States, and Senator WAGNER was fighting on this bill for a long time to get it before the Congress so we could do away with the duplication and get real efficiency in these employment offices.

Mr. GRANFIELD. And the proposed legislation will do away with that system?

Mr. CONNERY. It will do away with that system and cause the formation of real employment offices.

Mr. GRANFIELD. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; I yield to my colleague.

Mr. GRANFIELD. I would be amiss in my duty to the Members of this House if I did not take the time this afternoon to bring to their attention the attitude of the last administration toward the Wagner unemployment relief measures. The older Members will recall that Senator WAGNER, after spending months of study, evolved three measures, which were presented to the Congress for consideration. His program of unemployment relief was proclaimed throughout the country as the most constructive program offered to meet the crisis which was then confronting the Nation. The Hoover administration received this program very coldly and immediately displayed an unsympathetic attitude toward it.

Although the three measures were approved by the Congress, President Hoover affixed his signature to one of them without comment; he signed the second measure, and in a public declaration attempted to take from Senator WAGNER the great credit that was due him. The third measure, which is embodied substantially in the legislation under consideration today, received his pocket veto. At that time he declared the bill was unnecessary. Those of us who supported the Wagner measures were in absolute disagreement with the President's opinion and with his action.

We are informed today by the distinguished chairman of the Committee on Labor that the Hoover employment service has been valueless as an aid to the jobless in this country, and that the legislation before us is indispensable.

In reading over this bill I find a provision for the continuance and promotion of a system which will place in employment veterans of our wars. I am happy that this service is to be afforded our veterans. In view of the manner in which the Economy Act is being administered—and I must say its administration at present is unjust and is working great hardships upon our veterans—that this system which will enable veterans to be cared for in employment is a praiseworthy adjunct to the bill. It is apparent that this bill will receive the unanimous support of the Membership of this House, and I am happy to have the opportunity to vote again for this constructive piece of legislation which is so essential to unemployment relief and which provides a system of procuring jobs which will prove indispensable as the years go by.

I wish to thank my distinguished colleague from Massachusetts for this opportunity to address the House.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield to the gentleman from Missouri.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The gentleman from Massachusetts should know how the employment service was conducted by the last administration. We practically had nothing but a political set-up.

Mr. CONNERY. That is right.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Men who were not qualified were placed in charge of the offices, and yet this bill provides for the holding-over of the same men for 6 months. What explanation can the gentleman give for that?

Mr. CONNERY. It does not provide for holding them over because they have already been fired.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I take issue with the gentleman because they have not been discharged.

Mr. CONNERY. All these offices have been closed except the veterans' offices.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. And you have men in the veterans' offices who are not subject to the Civil Service and have not been giving the service they should give.

Mr. CONNERY. We have an amendment here to take them out of the Civil Service so the Secretary of Labor can appoint real, efficient men to do this job.

Mr. BACON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. BACON. I think the gentleman from Missouri exaggerates somewhat. As far as my own experience is concerned, I had a very efficient Democrat appointed in the New York office. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. DINGELL. Is it not true that the real difference in the new set-up as compared with the old is the abolishing of the centralized agency, which took up most of the appropriation here in Washington, and to establish these offices far and wide throughout the Nation?

Mr. CONNERY. Spread them throughout the Nation; yes.

Mr. DINGELL. Where they can, in fact, perform the service to the workingmen of the Nation.

Mr. CONNERY. Make them really efficient and have all the States cooperate. Now the States just look on it as a little branch of the Federal Government and do not pay much attention to these offices.

Mr. DINGELL. In other words, we were spending about $700,000 here in Washington when the agencies should have been in the hinterland or in the backwoods.

Mr. CONNERY. I may say to the gentleman that in many cases, to be just to the directors of these offices, very fine work was done. It all depended on the personnel of the offices, but they could not cooperate with the States, and that was the trouble.

Mr. DINGELL. And there were altogether too few of them in the field.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. Yes.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. I am very glad the gentleman made that statement, because I know that business men and the industries were very much interested in having these offices continued, as well as the men who were receiving jobs. They all found them very helpful. The director of the offices in the State was very able, and his office has been highly endorsed. In my own city of Lowell we were supposed to have had the finest branch office in the entire State.

Mr. CONNERY. Outside of Lawrence.

Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. And very fine work was done by that office. They were both fine.

Mr. KENNEY. This employment service will be rendered entirely free, and the applicant will not be charged anything for the service.

Mr. CONNERY. That is true.

Mr. BLANTON. There was a small employment office placed in my district and it served 150 square miles of territory.

It has only three employees, and the highest paid was $2,000 a year. It had its rent furnished by the people. The fixtures and paraphernalia were furnished free, and I am sorry to say that the present department entered an order abolishing the office when it was placing a large number of deserving people in positions. Under this bill we have been promised that these offices will be restored.

Mr. CONNERY. They will be restored.

Mr. HEALEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I yield.

Mr. HEALEY. What is to be done to cooperate with the States who already have employment service?

Mr. CONNERY. It will be just the same as it is in the highway system; they will cooperate with the Federal Government and thus do away with duplication.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CONNERY. I will yield.

Mr. PARSONS. Does the gentleman mean to say that this set-up will be new, that it will be apart and separate from the agencies of the State?

Mr. CONNERY. We are setting up these to encourage the States to set them up, and we will go on a 50–50 basis. It is to aid and to encourage the States to start employment offices, if they have not got them already.

Now, I do not want to take up any more time, I want to yield to some other gentlemen. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, Decoration Day in memory of and honor to the dead comes but once a year. I believe in memorializing the living as well as the dead. To do that we can utilize any one of the 365 days of the year.

To our appreciated new Members of the House, I want to say that the distinguished chairman of the very important Committee on Labor, Hon. WILLIAM P. CONNERY, Jr., of Lynn, Mass., is one of the most delightful personalities we have in Congress. He is an earnest, honest, conscientious, able, and energetic representative of the people. He may lack several inches of being 6 feet tall, and he may not weigh over 140 pounds, and yet in my judgment he is one of the really big men of this House of Representatives. [Applause.]

BILL CONNERY is one of the most lovable characters I ever knew. He is everybody's friend. And everybody is his friend. With his genial disposition he radiates sunshine around his colleagues constantly. Although he has a Master of Arts degree, he is not a lawyer, or a doctor, or a preacher, but in his warm heart he has a deep and eternal affection for his fellow man.

No other Member of this Congress is better qualified than he to serve as Chairman of the Committee on Labor. He has an intimate knowledge of the struggles, and trials, and tribulations of the great army of men who must labor for their daily bread. He knows how much it takes to feed them. He knows what it requires to clothe them. He knows just what it costs to house them. He knows the great sacrifices that families of the workingmen must undergo to pay for medicine, doctor bills, dentist bills, schooling and books for the children, and for the other many necessities of life. He knows how little time, and opportunity, and means they have for pleasure and recreation. He is in a position to sympathize with their walk in life. And he has for them a sympathy deep and unshakable. He is their loyal, dependable friend.

As a skilled actor in the theatrical profession he was a great entertainer. He received his training in Lynn, Mass., Montreal, Canada, and Worcester, Mass. He first chose a profession which gave him the opportunity to put gladness in people's hearts and divert their minds from cares and troubles. And then the cruel World War called him to our colors.

On August 23, 1917, WILLIAM P. CONNERY, Jr., enlisted as a private in Company A, One hundred and first Regiment United States Infantry, and served 19 months in France, taking part in all major operations, engagements, and battles of that regiment in the Twenty-sixth (Yankee) Division, and won promotion for meritorious service. The people of the Seventh District of the great Commonwealth of Massachusetts honored themselves by electing him to Membership in this House in the Sixty-eighth Congress. He has been reelected ever since, and on one occasion received the nomination of both major parties. And with his experience and his general knowledge of governmental affairs and the prestige that goes with his seniority, I feel sure that his worthy constituents will keep him here for many years to come. He deserves it all. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman has said so many nice things about me I now yield him 2 minutes on the bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. WELCH. I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 7 additional minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I am deeply grateful to my good friend from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY] and to my good friend from California [Mr. WELCH] for their kindness in yielding additional time. Both are to be commended for efforts they are continually exerting in behalf of labor. This Senate bill they have favorably reported from their committee is one they have been seeking to pass for several years. President Hoover stood in the way of their passing it in the last Congress.

I will show you exactly why it is needed. Until May 1, 1933, there was a United States employment office in my home city of Abilene, Tex., conducted by three small-salaried Government employees, Mr. Roy Savage receiving $2,000, Mr. Lloyd B. Thomas receiving $1,800, and Miss Kate Rathmell receiving $1,500 per year. The Government paid no rent. My constituents furnished them an office free. It gave them furniture free. It had the help and friendly cooperation of the chamber of commerce and of all the clubs of Abilene.

During last year, with this very small cost to the Government, this one office placed 9,500 idle men in employment. During January, February, March, and part of April this year this one office, manned by only three low-salaried employees, found jobs for and placed in employment 3,490 heads of families. But to the great surprise of everyone, there was sent to it on April 22, 1933, the following telegram:

WASHINGTON, D.C., April 22, 1933.

ROY R. SAVAGE,
United States Employment Service,
917 North Second Street, Abilene:

By direction of the Secretary of Labor your office will be closed April 30 and your services as manager and those of Lloyd B. Thomas, assistant, and Kate Rathmell, stenographer, will terminate that date. Arrange to keep office records intact pending later instructions regarding their disposition. Acknowledge by wire.

JOHN R. ALPINE.

While the above telegram was sent over the name of John R. Alpine, former director of the United States Employment Service, I was informed that he had been succeeded by a woman as director, appointed by Miss Frances Perkins, Secretary Department of Labor. My office immediately sent the following telegram:

ABILENE, TEX., April 25, 1933.

Hon. FRANCES PERKINS,
Secretary of Labor, Washington, D.C.:

Your director Alpine has wired United States employment office here to close April 30. I sincerely hope that you will not permit such foolish and ridiculous action. During last year after January 16 this Abilene office placed 9,500 men in employment. During less than 4 months this year it has found jobs for 3,490 heads of families, and is vital factor serving area of 150 miles square, at an expense of only three low-salaried Government employees. There would be just as much wisdom in abolishing entire Department of Labor. I respectfully request that such closing order should be rescinded, and this most valuable office continued. Please wire me your reaction.

BLANTON, Congressman.

Hon. C. W. Woodman, of Fort Worth, Tex., was the State director for Texas of this service. He sent me glowing reports of the splendid work of this Abilene office. He was getting wonderful results all over the State. To show that this office was closed without his approval I quote his letter as follows, to wit:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
UNITED STATES EMPLOYMENT SERVICE,
April 24, 1933.

Mr. ROY R. SAVAGE,
Manager United States Employment Service,
917 North Second Street, Abilene, Tex.

DEAR MR. SAVAGE: The first intimation I had of the closing of the Abilene office was your letter of the 22d quoting wire received by you and the one that you wired Washington. It must be a matter of finances that brought about this change.

I think you know how I feel in matters of this kind.

Yours truly,

C. W. WOODMAN, Texas State Director.

Immediately upon learning that this employment office had been ordered closed, 468 citizens of Abilene, Tex., signed the following petition to the Secretary of the Department of Labor, which my office, on April 25, 1933, forwarded to said Department of Labor, to wit:

ABILENE, TEX., April 25, 1933.

We, the undersigned citizens of Abilene, Tex., all having our application for work placed with the local office of the United States Employment Service, hereby endorse the Abilene office and its personnel. For more than 1 year we have been in constant contact with the employees of this office, during which time they have assigned to us the distribution of relief work, as well as placed men in outside work.

We have found the United States employment office of great benefit and service to ourselves and the community. We have found the officials in charge of the office always fair and courteous, and we believe they have at all times favored the best interests of the unemployed.

It is our hope that the present office and personnel will be continued until normal times return.

I have a copy of this petition in my office signed by said 468 citizens, and some of them I know to be as worthy as any citizens in the United States. It was an inexcusable error to close up that office. The Government got more of value out of the small amount of money expended than it has received from any similar amount ever expended for any purpose.

I took this matter up personally with the new Director of Employment down at the Department of Labor, and I learned that the only chance to get this office restored was through the passage of this bill now before the House. I am confidently expecting and depending upon the Department of Labor and the United States Employment Service to restore this office as soon as this bill becomes effective.

From the official report of this Abilene, Tex., office for the 1 month of March 1933, I quote the following:

Of the 925 placements for the month, 160 were permanent or became inactive on the file by reason of having secured regular part-time jobs. The total number of days' work resulting from all placements, both permanent and casual, was approximately 9,250 days.

From the special report sent me by this office I quote the following:

In canvassing the town I find practically every business man, salaried man, and rent house owner is doing something for someone less fortunate; but when we talk with these people they generally become convinced they have not done enough and give us a few days' work for some good man in their yard, garden, or house. As you doubtless realize, our unemployed consist chiefly of common laborers who are in conditions of actual want, and our first efforts have been toward somewhat alleviating this suffering.

When we remember that all the foregoing was accomplished by three low-salaried Government employees, and then remember the facts given us by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS] that there has been employed a civil personnel of 20,000 employees drawing an average of about $140 per month used to give forestry work to the young boys now in camp drawing $1 per day, it will convince anyone that a great mistake and blunder was made by some official in the Department of Labor in closing this employment office at Abilene, Tex., on May 1, 1933. I sincerely hope it will be restored. The facts about this one office illustrate and exemplify the purpose and scope of one of the main features of this bill now before this House for passage.

On April 30, 1933, most of the employment offices in the United States were abolished. We have no chance whatever to reestablish those offices except under this bill. I shall have the opportunity to revise and extend my remarks, of which I intend to avail myself, and I shall not impose further upon the time of the Committee. I ask unanimous consent to insert certain extracts in my remarks, and yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. THOM].

Mr. THOM. Mr. Chairman, I feel there is an opportunity for great usefulness under the terms of this bill for the creation of a national system of employment agencies. It is my belief that even with the return of normal business we shall have to deal with the problem of chronic unemployment. I believe that the displacement of men by machinery is so wide-spread that it presents to us, at least temporarily, one of the most serious problems that confront us as a people. I am hopeful that this system of employment agencies will not only seek to find jobs for men but that it will collect statistics and facts about the causes of unemployment, so that we may take steps to remedy the evil. After all, if in this society we have liberty and freedom, those things are insufficient and wholly inadequate, if we do not have the opportunity to work. In our complex civilization the right to work is becoming a sacred right in the minds of a great many progressive thinkers.

Up to this time we have never had correct statistics on unemployment. It is a reflection on our Government that we have failed in this respect. It will be recalled that at the outset of the depression the discussion centered largely around the number of unemployed in this country. It was a very futile argument, because it mattered not a great deal how many were unemployed, because the very fact of unemployment should have served as a danger warning, as a notice to Congress and to legislators that something must be done. As it was, we wasted a great deal of our time discussing the question of how many unemployed there were. I feel safe in saying that the estimate now given of 12,000,000 unemployed cannot be substantiated. I do not think there are any services, either private or otherwise, that can be accurate about these figures.

It is ridiculous that we, as a government, have been collecting statistics as to the number of cotton spindles, for instance, in operation; as to the number of bushels of wheat that are milled, which reports come to us practically every week; and yet have neglected to have definite and concise, thoroughgoing, and reliable statistics on this problem of human unemployment. The very basis of solution is first a knowledge as to its extent and as to its causes.

I feel very friendly to this legislation and I hope the system will be officered by men of vision and competency, so that it shall become not merely a system to provide a few jobs for employment-agency clerks, but that the staff shall consist of men who are principally interested in the solution of the problems of unemployment.

May I be permitted to make a few observations on the road back to employment and especially of the part the public works bill, already passed by the House of Representatives, will have in hastening our recovery, in the event this measure is finally enacted into law?

It is my understanding that in our economic history panics have usually seen the building industry and/or the railroads take the lead in recovery. Cheap material and cheap labor, together with easy money, induced capital to come out of hiding. This brought large-scale building with growing employment. The capital investment in turn gave men consuming power with which to purchase shoes, clothing, and other consumers' goods for themselves and their families. Benefits thus rapidly flowed to the so-called "lighter industries", such as textiles and shoes. Usually in step with the construction business, the railroads, foreseeing an increased movement of freight, began buying rails and setting hundreds of men to work on roadbeds, doing the necessary repairs that had been neglected during the period of a depression.

But these are different times. The construction industry seems to show little or no life, due to the utter collapse of our banking and credit system. Where at the present time are long-time loans available for permanent construction? To me it seems utterly out of the question for building, privately financed, to help lead us up out of the depression in the near future.

I now call your attention to the plight of the railroads. Their credit is gone, their dividends suspended. A new competitor in the field—the automobile truck—has disorganized the transportation business. As a result, those wholesale orders for car equipment that so often in the past transformed poor business into thriving business in a remarkably short time are not in sight. It is to be noted also that the private passenger automobile has given each man his own railroad. These automobiles, by and large, are in a dilapidated condition and many need replacement. Unfortunately this private rolling stock cannot be replaced through the use of credit on the broad scale that has marked railroad financing.

Now the public works bill undertakes the business of bringing to life the construction and building industry of the country, so much of which is centered in the great industrial States of Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York, and Illinois, where unemployment has produced its great distress. I see no way out of the situation except through a public works bill, administered sanely, and including truly beneficial projects to be carried on simultaneously with an encouragement of private industry. Of course, the public-works program to help break the depression involves Government financing, for credit is not obtainable elsewhere.

Some idea of the slump in building may be gained by these figures: All contracts in the United States in 1929 amounted to over $10,000,000,000; in 1932 the total was $2,839,000,000. How many men were sent into the unemployed ranks by this slump in this one field of activity it is hard to estimate. However, we know from our own observations that the carpenter, bricklayer, plumber, and other building mechanics have long been idle in our large cities.

Much of the work proposed in the public works bill is of such nature as sewers, grade-crossing removals, roads, and so forth, that can under no circumstances be considered economic waste. These projects eventually will be needed unless our whole society falls back into a state of unprogressiveness. I am not pessimistic enough to believe this will happen. Slum clearance in the large cities is another project that will contribute greatly to social welfare, and it has been executed through limited-dividend corporations, owned by private stockholders, in New York City, with great success.

Our first public-works programs were not as stimulative of business as they might have been, for the reason that the competition for these public jobs was so intense as to depress unduly the prices of materials, and the fierce rivalry sent labor in many instances down to starvation wages.

I have reports from Ohio made by a public-relief committee in my district, showing that plants furnishing material for public buildings have been paying such low wages that a worker and his family the next day after factory labor stopped, or even before, had to be transferred to the public-relief rolls. A specific instance is cited by this relief committee of a concern that has been furnishing material for Government work whose employees agreed to forego wages and participate in profits. Under this arrangement one man by affidavit says he received $1.29 for 44½ days' labor and another 93 cents for 48 days of labor. This sort of wage payments depressed the price of building products, so that other concerns paying the low wage of $1.50 a day could not compete. No wonder then that this relief committee was constrained to say:

From the foregoing those engaged in the work of administrating relief are compelled to feel that the public-works programs of the past have not greatly helped in reducing unemployment, nor have helped to restore any measure of self-support to the men engaged. Instead the work of relief is made more difficult by the fact that owing to the extremely low wages are being reconciled to living on public help. Under the competitive conditions heretofore, it is almost impossible for anyone to be successful in obtaining a Government contract at a price which does not require orders for materials to be placed at such a level as to force manufacturers greatly to reduce their normal cost. These reductions must finally rest upon the shoulders of labor, since in the last analysis labor is the principal cost in the production of raw materials.

This sort of unfair competition, that makes for long hours and starvation wages, is sought to be reached in the codes of trade practices prescribed for industry by the terms of the public works bill. This self-regulation of industry under Government control is to continue for the emergency period. It is the hope that these stabilizing factors which will tend to assure a profit to manufacturers will invite the use of bank credit, that is now so slow in expanding. It is to be remembered, however, that self-regulation of industry calls for a great measure of restraint, to the end that the consuming public shall not be oppressed. Even those who hope for high results from this type of legislative control realize that it is highly experimental and that it will require sound judgment on the part of participants, both labor and capital, to prevent it from being a burden that will invite public condemnation.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX].

Mr. TRUAX. Mr. Chairman, I want to add, if I can, to the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] in regard to the sterling character and worth of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY], the chairman of this committee. When I arrived in Washington the week of March 4, one of the first gentlemen I had the pleasure of meeting in this House was Mr. CONNERY, through a mutual friend back home in Akron, Judge O'Neil, who was a classmate of the gentleman from Massachusetts in college. I think while we are passing bouquets, it would not be a bad idea for some of us Democrats to thank the gentlemen on the minority side for the splendid cooperation they have given us in practically all bills affecting labor and agriculture.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TRUAX. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. Is this a testimonial meeting this morning or is it a session for the purpose of explaining the merits of this bill?

Mr. TRUAX. It is a little of each. The great problem in all of our minds has been the unemployment problem. Twelve million men are out of work. While those who do toil are fighting a losing battle, wearing out hand, head, and heart for a crust that becomes scantier, evermore bitter, there have been millions, tens of millions, who cannot even obtain the poor privilege of tramping on this treadmill, and they are sinking deeper day by day into the slough of despond, deeper into that most frightful of all Gehennas, the hell of want, and so this bill, with its companion bill and these amendments thereto, the Wagner bill, in my humble judgment, is one of the most important measures that this Congress will have enacted. We have restored already a very marked advance in the price of agricultural commodities through the anticipation of what the farm relief bill will accomplish.

Stocks and bonds and securities have mounted in value in anticipation of what inflation and abandonment of the gold standard will do for this country, but as yet the men back in the cities, the men in the small towns, and the men in the villages are still idle and unemployed and must depend upon charity and upon Government doles for support. For the first time in the history of this Government, I believe, the Wagner bill, authorizing an appropriation of $500,000,000 for the employment of men who do not wish to be dependent upon charity, who do not seek Government doles, but who want to earn their bread honestly and by the sweat of their brow, will provide employment for such men.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. TRUAX] has expired.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. WOOD].

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, after the many eloquent speeches that have been made I do not desire to take up much time, but there are a great many salient features of this bill that have not yet been touched upon.

This bill is not for the purpose of creating jobs. The bill mainly is for the purpose of connecting the men with the jobs; not only getting employment for as many people as possible, but getting men who are skilled in certain lines of occupation jobs in that particular line. It is very necessary that some tribunal or some agency or instrumentality of Government be set up that will systematically ferret out among various industries the jobs that will be suited to those who are unemployed who happen to be skilled in a certain line of employment. To my mind that is one of the greatest accomplishments of this legislation.

It will do another thing. There are a great many States in the Union that have no State free employment bureaus. A great many States have such bureaus. Those State free employment bureaus are maintained by the State alone, and, due to that fact, those State employment bureaus, or those who are operating them, are somewhat subservient to certain political or industrial interests; the State bureaus do not function as they should. I feel that the passage of this legislation, with the setting up of these various Federal free employment bureaus, working in cooperation and coordination with the State free employment bureaus, will have a great effect upon our free employment bureaus of Missouri. It will tend to encourage our State employment bureaus to make an exceptional effort. It will make possible for our State free-employment bureaus not to be just State institutions, but the benefit of those bureaus will be interstate. Therefore our State bureaus will be of an interstate character. That will be of great benefit to the State free employment bureaus.

Mr. Chairman, there is another thing that I feel is more important than anything else, which I am sure this legislation will accomplish. With the perfect coordination between Federal and State employment bureaus, it will have the effect of abolishing one of the most nefarious occupations that I know of, those human vipers that own and operate private employment bureaus, whose stock in trade is the practice of forever and eternally robbing the unfortunate man or woman who happens to be in need of employment. There is no more vicious aggregation of racketeers in this United States than the owners and operators of the private employment bureaus, which are operated for the express purpose of robbing the unfortunates who are in need of employment more than anything else.

That, together with connecting the workman and the mechanic with the proper job, the job that he is fitted to perform, I think will be of great service to the people of this Nation, and I hope this bill will be passed unanimously. [Applause.]

I yield back the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman yields back 5 minutes.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRISWOLD].

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Chairman, one thing in this bill which at this particular time should have the real interest of Congress is the change made by the House Committee on Labor leaving in this bill the present veterans' employment agencies, and leaving it there not under the Veterans' Bureau but leaving it there under the Department of Labor.

There is reason for that, especially at this time. That reason is that the Veterans' Bureau, insofar as its entire set-up is concerned on things of that kind, has used money injudiciously.

When Brigadier General Hines took over the active management of the Veterans' Bureau it was a service of 0,000 employees. It was an Army brigade in numbers. But General Hines had hopes of promotion. He built it up in numbers until he had under his command an Army division. He commanded as many as a major general. He built it up to 39,000—the strength of an Army corps, the command of a lieutenant general.

On the 1st day of July, after the present regulations start in effect, there will be eliminated entirely from the rolls 165,000 veterans with non-service-connected disabilities. Only those with service-connected disabilities will remain, and they will be cut from 20 to 40 percent. General Hines was responsible for figures on which these regulations were based. In view of that fact, it might be well to give some attention to the way in which he built up the Veterans' Bureau and how the money is spent which is appropriated for his use. When the last bonus army came to Washington and were out at Fort Hunt, General Hines decided that there should be a judge advocate. No one knows why. As many of you know, in the Army the judge advocate is the law member of the courtmartial. The bonus army was subject to the civil law of the State of Virginia. The only question that might have involved the Federal Government on military law would have been the question of jurisdiction, because these men were on Army post property. Even then the Veterans' Bureau would have no connection with the case. But General Hines decided that he must have a judge advocate for the bonus army, and proceeded to get him.

There were dozens of lawyers of all classes here in Washington on the Bureau pay roll, but General Hines got his judge advocate by sending out to Chicago and bringing in from there Mr. Harry Poole, who is classified in the Veterans' Bureau as a grade 5 lawyer. He brought Mr. Poole to Washington and his transportation was paid by the Government and he is keeping him here at $5 per day expense money in addition to his salary. But this was not expensive enough for General Hines. To take the place of Mr. Poole and do his work in Chicago while Mr. Poole was so busily engaged doing nothing as judge advocate of the bonus army in Washington, the General sent to Chicago, at Government expense, Mr. T. R. Callahan and Mr. Tom Eggleson, both grade 5 lawyers like Mr. Poole. They are still in Chicago, and while they are in Chicago they will each draw from the Government $5 per day expense money in addition to their salaries. This is the way General Hines is spending the money that he wanted Congress to take from the service-disabled veteran.

There are other peculiarities of the system by which the Veterans' Bureau handles its business and expends its money. If you, as a lawyer in your district, write the Veterans' Bureau about any case under litigation in the courts, the answer to your letter is reviewed five times. The answer to your letter is written by a $6,000 per year lawyer, and this lawyer's work is reviewed by a $6,400 per year man, who is reviewed by a $6,500 man, who is reviewed by a $7,000 per year man, and the final reviewing man draws $8,000 per year. It has never been determined why, if the work must finally, after passing through four other hands, be reviewed by the $8,000 man, that the $8,000 per year man at the head of the litigation division should not write the letter in the first place. And it would be well to know, also, some of the lawyers and some of the types of lawyers that are reviewing these decisions.

From July 1, 1924, to December 1, 1928, there was on the pay roll of the House Committee on Veterans' Affairs a man by the name of Carl Walker who drew $2,800 per year for his services as a clerk. On the 11th day of November 1929 he secured employment in the Veterans' Bureau in Class CAF 9, which is a clerical class, and was designated there as a control officer at a salary of $3,200 per year. In the course of his duties he was sent to Indiana and there he was peddled to the Howard Circuit Court at Kokomo, Ind., as an attorney and admitted to the bar on July 22, 1930, despite the fact that section 1033 of the Revised Statutes of the State of Indiana provides that one must be a voter, and that under the laws of the State of Indiana it is a misdemeanor punishable by a fine and imprisonment for one to gain admission to the bar fraudulently. After qualifying himself as a lawyer in this manner, Carl Walker returned to Washington at Veterans' Bureau expense and was appointed, on October 16, 1930, a grade 4 attorney, at a salary of $3,800 per year, and then on the 1st day of December, less than 2 months thereafter, this same Carl Walker was raised to a class 5 attorney at a salary of $4,600 per year. This same Carl Walker, who had never tried a lawsuit, was appointed a class 5 attorney at $4,600 per year. But the most peculiar part of this lawyer's case does not lie in the fact that he became so proficient in one and a half months that he was entitled to an $800 increase in salary, nor in the fact that he was so efficient that the Veterans' Bureau in a year's time gave him an increase of $1,200 per year in salary, but the very astounding circumstance is that at the time he was given his increases, and today he was and is a resident of the State of South Dakota, and that there is now on file as a part of the qualifying of Carl Walker for his present position with the Veterans' Bureau a certificate from a county officer of the State of South Dakota certifying to the fact that in January 1932, and "for 25 years next preceding the date of the certificate" Carl Walker was an actual bona fide resident of the county of Hughes and the State of South Dakota. This certificate was filed by Carl Walker himself to qualify for his position in the Veterans' Bureau, along with his certificate of admission to the bar of the State of Indiana. But Carl Walker did not explain how he could have been a resident of South Dakota and a bona fide resident and voter of the State of Indiana at the same time.

This boosting of Carl Walker into the law division of the Veterans' Bureau and every promotion he has had therein was approved by General Hines. It might be well to remember the oft-repeated statement of General Hines that there is no politics in the Veterans' Bureau, but it also may be well to remember that Carl Walker was the clerk of a former Republican Member of this body who was once spoken of as the successor to General Hines during the last administration.

If economies are to be effected, here are three instances where economies could be effected; where money has been expended improperly and a saving could be made and the money saved could be used where it would benefit some of the thousands of these veterans with service-connected disabilities that Congress has taken from the pay roll.

Because money is spent in this way by the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs when he is insisting that veterans' allowances be cut in the interest of economy, I am opposed to the Administrator having any control whatsoever over the veterans' employment agencies in this bill.

General Hines is also responsible for using the employees of the Veterans' Administration outside of Washington to make a profit for the Government. The employees of these hospitals received a cut of 15 percent in salary. Many of these employees, after deductions, receive less than $1,000 per year. They do not receive $5 per diem in addition to their salary as do the favored employees of the Administrator. They are required to live inside the hospitals and support a family outside. They are charged for their room and board. They pay the Government in one hospital 83⅓ cents a day for meals served to them at the same table with patients to whom the cost is only 35 cents a day. They pay for their sleeping quarters. General Hines fixes the prices to be charged both for meals and quarters. Although these employees were given a 15 percent reduction on the theory that the cost of living had reduced to that extent, the Veterans' Bureau did not take 15 percent off its charges to these employees.

In some cases General Hines actually increased the cost of quarters to them. Was this the intent of any Member of Congress who voted for the economy bill? I do not think it was. For this violation of the intent of Congress, for this exploiting of the employees, as well as the veterans with service-connected disabilities, General Hines is responsible. I introduced a bill to correct this evil, a bill that would force General Hines to pass on to these employees in the Bureau's charges to them the same percentage of reduction that the Government gave them in salary. That bill has been frozen. This Congress seems to be interested in justice to everyone but the veterans and the Government employees. To them Congress says: "Take a tater and wait." "We must take care of the bankers and Europe, then if any justice is left over perhaps you can have a very small portion." Such an attitude on the part of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs and of Congress is not only unjust it is intolerable. It violates every principle of equity. It disregards entirely the rights of citizens because they happen to be employees of the Veterans' Bureau. But it is treatment that is to be expected from the powerful tin god of the Veterans' Bureau to whom official Washington bows.

I think it would be well for Congress to scrutinize carefully every grant of power or money to the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs, and after such scrutiny to refuse the grant.

The Veterans' Bureau is not being conducted for the benefit of the veteran but for the benefit of General Hines and the political friends of General Hines. There are some good men in the Bureau. What work is really being done is done by these good men, but at the top we have the drones and political parasites. Under the Hines regime the good men do not reach the top. Those exalted places are held open for Hines' "yes" men.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana yields back 1 minute.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER].

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, I am quite sure that if you read the hearings on this bill and the hearings on a bill similar to this one which we passed but which unfortunately was vetoed by President Hoover, you will find that there is a clear-cut indication that employers in this country are dissatisfied with the present United States employment system, that the agencies that have been set up heretofore have not inspired very much faith and confidence on the part of employers and they want a different set-up. The set-up they seek and will have is embodied in this bill, which is sponsored in this House by my esteemed colleague and friend, the gentleman from New York [Mr. PEYSER].

One thing that always struck me as peculiar in our country was the fact that we compelled a man out of a job to pay for getting a job. We penalized him when he needed work. We made him pay a fee to private agencies when he could least afford to do it. It is interesting to note that in countries like England, France, Germany, and Italy it is made a criminal offense to exact a penny, a sou, or a mark from anyone out of a job as compensation for getting him a job. I would like to see the day and hope it may be near at hand when we, too, will make it criminal to exact toll from a man who is out of a job in order to place him in a job.

This bill will go far toward bringing men and jobs together. I know from the testimony heretofore given by our very brilliant Secretary of Labor, Frances Perkins, that there have been a number of instances where outside the confines of the State of New York, for instance, there was a demand for a certain type of employee and the workers were in New York desiring to get those positions.

The Bureau of Labor in New York over which Miss Frances Perkins presided was powerless to take those men and ship them across the State border because there was no power lodged in that State bureau to do that very thing.

What this bill does is to make labor mobile so that if, for example, in the city of Brooklyn where there are a great many ladies' shoe factories, there are jobs available but no one to fill them and there are skilled shoe workers, for example, in St. Louis, this bureau to be set up could take those skilled workers in St. Louis and send them to Brooklyn where the jobs were; and they will have the funds from which to advance money for the transportation of these people. Thus the people will be made happy in these newly created jobs.

As another illustration, if skilled ironworkers or sheet metal workers are needed in Youngstown, Ohio, and none are to be found in that locality sufficiently skillful or efficient to take the jobs, and across the State border in Kentucky such men may be found, under the provisions of this bill the jobs can be brought close to the men and the men can be brought close to the jobs through transportation of these workers across State lines by the agency set up by the bill.

For these reasons I am happy to cast my vote for this bill.

Senator WAGNER has labored long to bring this bill about. It was part of his original program to alleviate suffering and misery caused by unemployment and the displacement of labor by machinery. He deserves great credit for his work in this regard. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. PEYSER].

Mr. PEYSER. Mr. Chairman, I wish to thank all the previous speakers because they have really made my job as the sponsor of this bill in the House an easy one. I think every point to be covered in this bill has been touched upon by some speaker who preceded me, but there are a few things I would like to bring to your attention which may convince you, in case you are in any way opposed to this bill. However, I really believe and feel very happy to say that I think it will be passed by a unanimous vote.

I may supplement the remarks that have thus far been made by reading into the RECORD a letter I received a few days ago from the Department of Labor. The letter reads as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, May 25, 1933.

Hon. THEODORE A. PEYSER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PEYSER: Now that the Committee on Labor has unanimously reported on your bill, H.R. 4559, I hope that every possible effort will be made to expedite its enactment by the Congress before this session adjourns.

Plans for industrial recovery make imperative the development of an adequate system of public employment offices. Without such a system, chaos in the labor market is inevitable.

Under the circumstances, may I again stress the need for favorable action on this measure at the earliest possible moment?

Sincerely yours,

FRANCES PERKINS.

I am only bringing this to your attention to confirm the statement that has been made that the Department of Labor is eager that this bill be passed.

When the bill was brought up in the Senate on Monday, for the information of those who did not read the RECORD, the bill was passed in less than 4 minutes. The only question raised at that time was one by Senator KING, who asked whether the Secretary of Labor approved the measure. Outside of that the matter came to a vote and the vote for the bill was unanimous.

I am very glad and proud of the opportunity of being interested in a bill on this side of the Capitol that is fostered by my good friend Senator WAGNER in the Senate after the hard work he has given to this measure for several years. I know that he and all who have been interested in this bill will be most happy at its passage. No one is more deserving, and I consider it a great honor to have my name as a comaker of the bill linked with the name of Senator WAGNER.

I may add that the amendments that are to be introduced to the Wagner bill will bring the bill into the shape approved unanimously by the Labor Committee of the House. I thank you for your kind attention and sincerely hope that you can support the Wagner-Peyser bill, for which I also thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT].

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, I shall not confine my compliments to the chairman and ranking minority member of this committee but shall extend them to the whole committee, as the country will credit the Congress with passing in this bill the greatest single measure going with the most directness to providing help to those who need help.

I cannot be otherwise than in hearty sympathy and accord with measures of this kind. Mr. Chairman, it was just 40 years ago that I introduced and put through the Legislature of Pennsylvania the first piece of legislation in my public career. It was a labor bill, which is still in operation. Therefore I am in hearty accord with the bill; and while I know nothing about the technical structure of the measure or how it may work—like any other patent, it is a good thing if it works—the intention is certainly in the right direction.

It is quite manifest to me, Mr. Chairman, that so far as the working qualities of this bill are concerned, no discredit will fall upon any of my Republican friends. It is plain to be seen that while this is the greatest piece of legislation to be offered on this floor at this momentous session, in my opinion, and in the light of an experience of 20 years here, it is clearly manifest that since the States will have nothing to do with appointing the officers who are going to administer the measure, it may well be understood what the political complexion of each division will be, at least so far as they can apply it.

Now, I say this bill and one other bill will be reckoned as the greatest pieces of legislation conceived and executed during this session of Congress. They will restore the country to prosperity if they will work. There are two great fundamental principles in these bills.

One is to furnish employment, which means purchasing power and consuming power, and without these elements you can administer all the financial hypodermics from now until doomsday without bringing about the result that we all desire.

Then the other great element of our body politic is the farmer, and you can use all the hypodermics there without success until we can unfold some method by which the farmer who raises his crop can reach the market and get an adequate price for his product, a price above his cost of production. It does not matter how much his gross is unless he has a net.

You have put through a bill here in the hope of being able to find a way of getting this kind of market for the farmer. Why this problem cannot be solved I do not know. With all the brains we have here and the various and numerous varieties of farm boards, and with the untold millions of dollars that have been spent in my lifetime trying to stimulate agriculture, it does seem strange to me there has not been some way devised to find such a market.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute.

Mr. FOCHT. I want to say to my friends here that the farmer will reach such a market if you will only give him the chance, and we ought to have the brains and the ability, in addition to this, to lift the burden of taxation from the farmer and give him an equal break in taxation, and then, for God's sake, let him alone. He can run his own business if you will just let him alone. I know that they can do this up in my country, and all the farmers of the West came from the East, and the farmer can everywhere take care of his own business if you do not overburden him with taxes and inquisitions.

With these two bills properly constructed I look for a grand gallop of prosperity as soon as we get out of here and the people know what they are to do. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. RAMSPECK].

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, in the last Congress this same legislation was passed, but, unfortunately, it did not meet the approval of the President.

In the bill which passed in the Seventy-second Congress there was a provision to take care of the States that do not have a State employment service. This was section 10 of that bill, and the committee will offer to the pending bill a similar section to take care of the twenty-odd States in the Union that do not now have any State employment service, and therefore, could not take advantage of this bill without this amendment which the committee will offer, at my suggestion. Section 10, which is to be offered to take care of the situation, reads as follows:

SEC. 10. During the current fiscal year and the 2 succeeding fiscal years the director is authorized to expend in any State so much of the sum apportioned to such State according to population, and so much of the unapportioned balance of the appropriation made under the provisions of section 5 as he may deem necessary, as follows:

(a) In States where there is no State system of public employment offices, in establishing and maintaining a system of public employment offices under the control of the director.

(b) In States where there is a State system of public employment offices, but where the State has not complied with the provisions of section 4, in establishing a cooperative Federal and State system of public employment offices to be maintained by such officer or board and in such manner as may be agreed upon by and between the governor of the State and the director.

This means that every State will have an opportunity through its legislature to provide for its participation under the other sections of this bill, particularly under section 4, before this service is taken away from them; otherwise there are some twenty-odd States in the Union that would not be able to participate in this plan.

Mr. DOWELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes; I yield to the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. DOWELL. It occurs to me that there should be an office in every State of the Union, and will not this bill, when it is enacted, be an encouragement and a suggestion to all the States that they should cooperate and assist in putting offices in each State?

Mr. RAMSPECK. The gentleman is correct and this amendment will take care of them until they have had that opportunity. Of course, if they refuse to establish the system and take advantage of this cooperative system, then that is just their hard luck.

There is one other amendment which is to be offered and that I am very much concerned about. It has been discussed by my colleague from Indiana [Mr. GRISWOLD], and I simply want to mention my interest in the maintenance of the veterans' offices.

Unfortunately, the Spanish War and service-connected World War veterans are suffering from a maladministration of the Economy Act, which should and must be corrected before this Congress adjourns. [Applause.]

Mr. O'MALLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. Yes.

Mr. O'MALLEY. I was just going to inquire of the gentleman whether the gentleman knows the reason for striking out the provision that would compel this agency to cooperate with the Veterans' Administration in securing employment for veterans?

Mr. RAMSPECK. An amendment will be offered in place of that to require the maintenance of an office for veterans' employment, in which must be employed only veterans. So instead of simply cooperating, we will have a special division for the veterans.

Mr. O'MALLEY. In other words, this agency is going to try to get some jobs for these veterans that have had their compensation taken away from them.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Absolutely; and if the committee amendment is adopted these offices for veterans will be operated by the veterans themselves. [Applause.]

Mr. O'MALLEY. That seems to me to be the only excuse for appropriating $4,000,000.

Mr. RAMSPECK. I think there are other valuable reasons for establishing the service.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 3 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DUNN].

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, Members frequently ask me if I am totally blind. I tell them that I am; and everyone, of course, expresses sympathy. May I say to Members of the House this morning that I have my sight right now—I have foresight enough to see that this bill is going to pass by a big vote. [Applause.] I am mighty glad that the soldiers are going to get something when this bill is enacted into law. Every man and woman in this House knows that when a man or woman attains the age of 40 years today it is almost impossible for them to obtain employment. In fact, it is utterly impossible for a war veteran to obtain employment. Why? Because managers of industry do not want an ex-service man because they are convinced that he has some physical defect. This department, which is going to be operated by ex-service men, is, in my opinion, one of the most desirable and progressive pieces of legislation introduced in this House at this special session.

I know that the veterans who will be at the head of the department will go out and demand jobs for their buddies.

I may say, Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, that it is an outrage and abominable to think that the men on whom our Nation depended, and on whom our Nation must depend in the future, have had to get down on their knees and ask some charitable organization for assistance. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. CONDON].

Mr. CONDON. Mr. Chairman, the problem of unemployment is a permanent one in this country in my opinion. For that reason I am happy to note that the Committee on Labor has brought back this bill that deals so fully with this problem.

This is not an emergency bill. It is a bill that looks into the problem, as the great Senator from New York [Senator WAGNER] has looked at it for many years. He has envisaged the time when the country will be unable to take care of this unemployment under present conditions, unless a Nation-wide employment service is established under the Federal Government.

It is necessary that we should have a great clearing house for the distribution of available jobs for the working men and women of this country.

In order that such a clearing house may operate at its maximum efficiency, in order that it may do the job and do it well, it is necessary that there shall be in every State in this Union an office to cooperate with the States, and in order that the system may have the necessary cooperation and encouragement locally it is essential that the State itself do something to support this system.

It is well, therefore, that the bill has been drawn in such a way that the States are invited to appropriate in order to relieve unemployment in their particular jurisdictions by setting up State employment offices.

When I first came to Congress it was my happy privilege to vote for a similar bill which was introduced by Senator WAGNER. I was very sorry that the last administration did not feel it possible to approve that bill after the Congress had passed it. I am glad to know that this administration, with an entirely new view of the great problems that affect this country, is welcoming this kind of legislation, and is not only willing but anxious that it be passed without delay. It was a great pleasure, I am sure, to every Member of the House to hear that the Department of Labor is asking for this bill at the earliest possible opportunity, so that it can cooperate with the departments of labor in the several States of the Union in solving this great and pressing problem of unemployment. Unless we tackle that problem and strive to the best of our ability to solve it, there will be continuous trouble in this country. We must organize in every part of the country proper agencies such as this bill provides to take care of the distribution of surplus labor, so that all men and women may have an opportunity to earn an honest living. It is very fortunate indeed that the committee in looking at this question of unemployment looked at it not only from the standpoint of the industrial sections of the country, but also that they have written into the bill a provision that has to do with the agricultural displacement of labor and I sincerely hope that, as has been predicted on the floor of this House, there will not be a single vote against the bill, but that it will receive the same unanimous acceptance in this House as it did in the other Chamber, and that it will go to the President to receive his immediate approval and be enacted into law at the earliest possible moment. I congratulate the Committee on Labor for the assistance which they have given to solving the unemployment problem by so promptly and favorably reporting this bill and I want also to pay my tribute of respect to the chairman, the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY], who has worked so long and valiantly for this legislation and who is the greatest friend of labor in this House. Mr. Speaker, I shall gladly vote for this measure. [Applause.]

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. HEALEY.]

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Chairman, I am happy to have this opportunity to say a few words in support of this meritorious measure brought in here by my distinguished colleague, Mr. CONNERY, the Chairman of the Committee on Labor. I listened with great pleasure to the complimentary remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] concerning my colleague, Mr. CONNERY, and I subscribe to everything that he has said. I think labor in this country is very fortunate indeed to have as chairman of this committee a man with his broad and sympathetic understanding of its problems. For weeks in this present Congress the Chairman of the Committee on Labor and the members of his committee have worked arduously preparing and drafting the Connery 30 hour bill. This committee has held lengthy hearings lasting well into the nights on that bill, and even though the bill has not been enacted into law, and will probably not be in this Congress, that labor has not been entirely lost. There appeared before that committee great industrialists, employers of labor, sociologists, labor leaders, and the Congress as a result has a great deal of valuable data to be found in the record of the hearings to assist it in the future in meeting this great problem of unemployment.

In my State back some years ago the desirability and necessity for conducting free employment service was recognized, and we have for many years maintained a free employment service. This bill will serve to complement and supplement that service, and wherever such a similar service is maintained in the several States of the Union. It will further set up free employment agencies in the States that do not already maintain that service. It will serve to banish forever the private employment agencies that for years have been extorting from a man who so desperately sought a job that of necessity he paid them the tribute they so cruelly demanded. It is a pleasure to add my word to all that gentlemen who have preceded me have said in urging the passage of this legislation. I hope that this humane bill will be passed by a unanimous vote of the House. [Applause.]

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WEIDEMAN].

Mr. WEIDEMAN. Mr. Chairman, for many years the emaciated and decaying body of the unemployed worker has been the legitimate prey for the human vultures who have disguised themselves as employment agents. I hope this bill puts an end to that. I will not say that all of these agents should be likened unto vultures, but many of them should, and the more unscrupulous they were the more vulture-like they became, the more promises they made, and the less conscience they exhibited.

I think the unemployment problem is more or less of a permanent nature until such time as men are elected to both Houses of Congress who, by legislation, will make it possible for every man to have that right, God given, to secure free employment, the right to work.

Also, at this time I extend my compliments to all of the members of this committee on both sides of the aisle. I commend the Republican members of the committee for the wonderful cooperation they have put into this bill in working with our chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY]. I think the members of the Labor Committee have the most thankless job of any committee in the House. They serve as a sort of buffer state between capital and labor, and have done so for years. I compliment my friend from Massachusetts. Many times he has voted not with the majority. It is easy to march down the street behind the flag and wave your hat along with the majority when popular opinion seems to be that way, but the gentleman from Massachusetts has borne the cross for labor in this House when he stood alone, and there is no Member of the House who does not respect him for it. [Applause.]

In metropolitan areas the worker has been the legitimate prey for thievery. He has been charged $3 here and $5 there for just the promise of a job in many of these fly-by-night employment agencies. I hope this bill will abolish those creatures. I hope it coordinates our system of employment so that we will not have a surplus of labor in one part of the country and a dearth in another. It will enable this Government to know at all times just how many men are out of employment, and if we have accurate knowledge of those figures, then we may be able to legislate intelligently on this matter.

GIVE THE OLDER FACTORY WORKER A CHANCE TO LIVE

In metropolitan areas when a man is 40 years old he cannot get employment. I hope the administration of this bill is so worked out that a man who is 40 years old, a man who the highly industralized manufacturing interests say they cannot use because the young boys can work much faster, will be able to get a job. I hope that condition will be equalized to give the man of middle age and past middle age a chance to get a job.

I am glad to see a provision in this bill that will provide employment for veterans. The average veteran of the World War is now past the 40-year mark and he finds it very hard to get a job. They march up to these factory gates in droves and they stay there all day, only to be turned back at night, to go home without a penny in their pocket to feed their children. Now, under a coordinated system of employment agencies, I hope we have intelligent administration so that a man will not have to walk from factory to factory in search of work until his feet burn, until he can walk no longer. I think the day is coming with the establishment of this law and with the sending of men to both Houses of Congress who are favorable to the rights of men as are the members of the Labor Committee in both the House and Senate at this time, this problem may be solved.

I live in hopes that this measure will function so that the men who have been out of work for 3 years can at least have a chance at a job. It is not always the best worker who gets the job. Sometimes it is the man who is most glib with his tongue and who presents himself at the employment gate in better light who gets the job. The man who is the plodder, the man who works day in and day out, never loses a day, and turns his all back to his family, but who may not be quite as good a talker, will under the administration of this law have a chance to work. I hope the men who have been out of work longest will be given the first chance to secure employment under this bill. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WEIDEMAN] has expired.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 5 minutes.

There has been but one request for time on this side of the aisle. That request was by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT]. I take it for granted, and I feel safe in saying, that the Republican minority is unanimously in favor of this bill.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, the main reason for this legislation is that the present United States Employment Service is most unsatisfactory. The Federal Government has operated employment offices in every State of the Union independently of the State service. The Federal Government service has had no relation to the State service. The Federal service not only does not coordinate with the State service, but, in most instances, is actively competing with the State service and running an independent office in the State when there was already in the same State or the same city a State employment office. Also, there is actual friction between the employment services.

This bill proposes a scheme of Federal leadership, with the placement work done by the States, in cooperation with such leadership. By taking the leadership the Federal Government can set up standards, statistical control plans, give the necessary study, circulate the necessary information, and assist in bringing all of these offices into one general system.

To assist and stimulate the development of a system by the States, the Federal Government will give sums of money to match the moneys already appropriated by the States or set aside by the States, for the development of a free employment service. We should keep the pattern of the States in doing their own work in placement, and put the Federal Government in the position of helping and encouraging them to do so, the Federal Government being responsible for the statistical work and saving the States this expense, and the statistical information being available to all the States. The Federal Government is also to do the research work, which is often too expensive for the States to do individually, the function of the States being to perform the task of getting the jobs and the workers brought together.

Mr. Chairman, as a matter of fact, this bill need not have taken up but very little time of Congress. It is a humanitarian measure. It is one of the few measures that has been passed by Congress thus far this session of a humanitarian nature.

I hope the amendments that will be offered by the distinguished chairman of the committee will be unanimously adopted and this bill be sent on its way to the President, who, I am sure, will gladly give it his approval. [Applause.]

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, those of us who come from the large cities realize the necessity for this legislation. My only regret is that the amount appropriated is not equal to the amount that will be appropriated in future years. I am going along with the committee if the chairman is satisfied on the $1,500,000 set aside for expenses and advances to the States for the fiscal year 1934, but I cannot help but express the thought that, with over 12,000,000 people out of employment, it would be well to increase that amount to $4,000,000, the amount set aside for 1935 and other years.

The finances of the various States are at a very low ebb and they need Federal aid. We have extended help to the farmers; we have extended help to the bankers and corporations; but this is the first time we are getting right down to helping the man who is out of a job. I do not think we can spend too much money to place unemployed in jobs.

My distinguished colleague from Missouri [Mr. WOOD] told you something about the private employment agencies. No one on the floor of this House knows more about that situation than does the gentleman from Missouri. For many years he has been president of the State Federation of Labor of Missouri, and only last week he was reelected to that position. He did not tell you half of it, for the want of time. Such vultures who prey upon the unfortunates out of work must be put out of commission, and this bill should put them out of commission. If it is not enough we should put teeth in it.

The man who is depressed, looking for a position to feed his family, will go to any extreme to get work, and when those men require him to agree to give them half of his first week's salary, and sometimes half of his first 15 days' salary, what can he do but agree? And in many instances when this time expires the man loses his position. Investigation has disclosed that the employer is working with the private employment agency, and that there is a big turnover in employees, unskilled laborers, and a splitting of the amount the employment agency receives for getting men work.

I am very pleased the committee is to offer an amendment that will allow the States whose legislatures already have adjourned to participate in this legislation.

During the present week I have received telegrams from the industrial commissioner of Missouri. She is waiting for this legislation. She says we need it and need it badly.

You speak of veterans' employment agencies. We had a veterans' employment agency in St. Louis, and they put it in the dome of the Federal building. You almost had to hire a scout to find the office. I say it was unworkable just as this committee report states that it was unworkable. I know that it was practically of no value. The money was practically thrown away. The Department of Labor sent a man from Washington to Missouri, to be the director of employment in Missouri, a man who did not know anything about the State of Missouri. To get positions and understand the employment needs the director of an employment bureau should be a man who resides in the community. Such a man who knows those who can hire men. I think extreme care should be taken in the selection of the personnel to carry out this program.

I again say to the chairman and members of the committee who are to be complimented for bringing in this legislation that I feel they should give serious thought to increasing the amount for next year.

I realize that probably the Bureau of the Budget has said this is the limit, but I am in favor, if necessary, of going a little over the Bureau of the Budget. [Applause.]

You are going to end this depression when you place the unemployed back to work, thus increasing the purchasing power of the masses. Until you do that we will not solve the problem that confronts you.

A campaign to induce chambers of commerce, industrial clubs, and other civic and business organizations to cooperate with the Federal and State employment agencies should be started at once and a campaign to place men to work started. You can get a real start to finish the job of ending the depression with this legislation if it is properly administered. [Applause.]

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER].

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KELLER].

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Chairman, in starting to talk about a bill of this kind, I wish to call attention, if I may, to the fact that at the present moment there are no less than 13,000,000 unwillingly idle men in America. The root of the matter not only goes back further than this bill, but requires very much more fundamental legislation. We have got to recognize certain fundamental things and hold them in mind, not only for the present but for the future. Let us not satisfy ourselves with passing emergency legislation, but let us drive constantly toward the permanent legislation that will reach out year after year in the direction of the rights of men.

The first thing we have got to recognize in legislation of this kind is that the very first human right set out in the old declaration is the right to life; and the right to life depends on the right and the opportunity to labor. We must understand, therefore, that the first duty of government is to assure an opportunity to every man to earn his living by his labor. The Government must guarantee that the man, not one man but all men; not one class but all classes; not to one section but to all sections; that wherever the American flag floats there is understood to be the right of a man to earn a living by his labor. Until we accept this we will fall short of the conception that must hereafter guide us in the social legislation upon which this Government must hereafter rest more and more.

I wish to compliment not only the chairman of this Committee on Labor, but its other members also. However, first I want to compliment the chairman, because BILLIE CONNERY is two things on this committee, not one. He is a man who labored himself and who has the standpoint and viewpoint of men who labor. But he is something more. He is a man who followed the flag across the seas, who went into the front-line trenches with the rest of the boys who went there, and he has the full heart of sympathy for those men. I have sat beside him in the committee room when we had many men tell us of the terrible condition of laboring men in America. I know that he has at heart the interest of every man who labors and every man who followed the American flag. [Applause.]

It would not be fair, however, if I did not at the same time mention the man who preceded him as chairman for a number of years on this splendid Labor Committee. That is the gentleman from California [Mr. WELCH]. [Applause.] He is a man all the way down the line. I do not care anything about his party politics. The fact that he sits on the Republican side cuts no figure with me. He knows what the laboring men of America need, and he is not afraid to say it. His years of experience have been invaluable to this committee.

One more man I want to mention is RAMSPECK, from the Old South [applause], the most progressive man south of the Mason and Dixon line. I hope many more like him will be sent up here by the southern Democrats. He knows that the very same rules that have so long applied to labor north of the Mason and Dixon line will ultimately extend all the way down to the Gulf of Mexico to every man who labors, regardless of color, regardless of previous condition of servitude, regardless of all things except that he be an American. I am glad to welcome him and men of his class, especially from that region.

I ought also to mention the giant young battler from Detroit, WEIDEMAN. He knows how to fight and loves a good fight when it is for something like this. I must not forget DUNN, whose blind eyes see so clearly for men who labor; or Mrs. NORTON, with her fine womanly sympathy; or GRISWOLD; or WOOD; or FITZGIBBONS; or HARTLEY; or, indeed, any other of that splendid loyal committee.

The men who make up the Committee on Labor are men of sympathetic understanding, men who love their fellow beings, and who want to give them a chance in the world. Last year in the wintertime, when men were tramping into the room of the Committee on Labor from the coal regions of Pennsylvania, you did not see any fishy eyes around that committee table. You saw eyes of real men who knew what it meant to labor, and some of them saw that the men who came there barefoot did not leave that way.

I confess that my sympathy may be greater than my ability to achieve. But I thank God that it leads me at least to work, to struggle to do the things that ought to be done for the men who labor in this country. And that includes the farmers of this country, every one of them. They used to be considered capitalists. Today they are laboring men, subject to exactly the same conditions, exactly the same economic laws, causes, and effects as are the men who work in the factories, on the railroads, in the mines, and in the quarries.

And until we come to understand that all men who produce wealth are eternally dependent upon one another; that we cannot have prosperous farmers and poverty-stricken city dwellers any more than we can have prosperous city dwellers and poverty-stricken farmers; that city and country will rise and prosper together or wallow together in the gutters of poverty; that city and country, farmer and laborer are tied together irretrievably. Until we come to a full understanding of all that we will fall short of our duty to our country.

We must awaken fully to the fact that industry is now, and always has been, purely a national matter. Under our Constitution State lines never have been recognized as applying to industry. We must look upon industry as a national matter alone and solve the problems of industry through national laws. Any less a conception of industry will of necessity only handicap and delay the solution of the great question of unemployment, the most ominous problem that has ever faced civilization.

This bill, the Wagner-Peyser bill, as you all know, is for the purpose of establishing national labor agencies to cooperate with the State labor agencies where these now exist, and to induce their establishment where they do not yet exist. This is the attempt to carry out the long-accepted idea of bringing the man and the job together. It will be of tremendous importance in connection with putting into operation our great public-works program now nearing enactment into law. But it will go far beyond that in future usefulness to keep the balance between the man who needs the work and the work that needs the man. I am proud to call attention to the fact that this bill provides for retaining the employment offices by veterans for veterans, by the Government which they served. This Labor Committee of the House fought for and won this change from the original bill.

I want to call the attention of the committee, if I may, to the fact that I shall bring up at the next session of this body a child labor law, and I shall lay it before you frankly, under the belief that the general-welfare clause of the Constitution is entirely sufficient to justify the passage and the enforcement of a right and reasonable child labor law without amending the Constitution.

I shall bring up before this body a Federal old-age pension, because we can never solve the question of unemployment until we do away with child labor and the fear of poverty in old age. [Applause.]

I shall bring up before this body a resolution that has been pending for a year and a half before the Rules Committee taking the Government of the United States out of the class that raises the question of a man's age and denies him an opportunity to labor and to live solely because he has passed a certain milestone on the journey of life.

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLER. In just a moment I shall yield.

This will compel the Government of the United States to set an example, so that when we go out and ask that a man may be judged on his fitness for work, the corporation cannot point to the Government and say, "Your Government has age limits and that justifies us in denying a man the opportunity to labor and to live whether he be 40; whether he faces starvation only because he is 40 years of age." We are going to remove these age limits because no government has a right to set any age limit until it stands ready to grant an old-age pension at that limit. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLER. I am sorry I did not get to answer the gentleman's question, but I wanted to finish this statement.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman one half minute to answer the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman from Massachusetts yields one half minute to the gentleman to yield to me for an observation. I should simply like to observe, as a Republican, that there is not a more courageous Member in the House than Mr. CONNERY, the able chairman of your committee. [Applause.] And there is no better friend of labor, or of the veterans. [Applause.]

Mr. KELLER. I join in cheering the observation. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. MEAD].

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, I had no intention of participating in this debate until a few moments ago, but I feel it is quite proper that I should. Up until the time when I entered public life, in 1913, I was employed on one of our railroads and was president of the Switchmen's Union, and for many years took an active part in labor counsels, and I am, of course, vitally interested in labor legislation. This bill is being supported by labor and by labor's friends.

I should not only be interested because of my former connection with labor organizations but also by reason of the fact that I supported this measure in the last Congress. Senator WAGNER, who sponsored this legislation in the Seventy-first Congress, sensed the approaching depression. He presented a program of legislation which, if enacted, would have lessened the suffering and unemployment resulting from the depression. In my judgment, it would have expedited our return to better times and better conditions. [Applause.] I want to say here that Senator WAGNER, who prepared this program of legislation, made a mighty contribution to the progressive thought of our day and age, and his contribution, large as it is, will serve to guide us in the economic crises of the future.

Two of the bills which he presented were enacted into law. One of them set up a long-time planning body that would plan for the construction of public works during times such as we are now going through. They would set up a reservoir by delaying the construction of public projects when business is otherwise normal, and at the very beginning of a period of depression this program of public works would be released. Such a plan would stop deflation and buoy consuming power. It would also enable our workers to find employment.

The second measure set up a bureau within the Department of Labor to keep an accurate account of unemployment in every section of the country, and no government can tackle the unemployment question intelligently unless it knows where it is and what it is, unless it knows its nature and its extent. The creation of this board is a vital step in the fulfillment of the Senator's program.

The third measure was the bill we are now considering. This measure provides for a national system of employment offices, offices that would cooperate rather than compete with State agencies. A vital necessity to fit in the scheme and complete the program launched several years ago by the able junior Senator from New York.

The plan failed. Of course, it failed. It failed because the administration was wholly without sympathy for the plan. It failed because the administration failed for over a year to admit that the depression was on us. It failed because those that had the direction and the administration of these laws were in nowise sympathetic with their aims and purposes, it failed because the then President of the United States refused to sign the very bill which we now have before us. We will pass the bill again with the votes of Democrats and Republicans alike, and it will be signed by President Roosevelt and sympathetically administered by the Secretary of Labor.

I am happy to see the measure before us, and I, too, congratulate the chairman and the members of the Committee on Labor for giving us an opportunity to vote for it again.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield 4 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. FORD].

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 2 minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. FORD].

Mr. FORD. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that to make an address urging the passage of this bill at this particular time is something like carrying coals to New Castle, for apparently everybody is in favor of it.

However, I want to make a few observations. The United States Government has in the past years spent annually from seven to fifteen million dollars in sending what was the equivalent of traveling salesmen around the United States and around the world in the drumming up of business.

These traveling salesmen—they were called special agents—were out for the special purpose of looking after the interests of the business and financial interests of the country. We spent that money in the greatest freedom, and there was never any criticism of it.

As it happens the last President was a man who while Secretary of Commerce broadly developed that system.

Then, a year ago, when the Wagner bill—probably one of the greatest pieces of constructive, remedial, and sociological legislation ever conceived in this country—was passed by both Houses and came to him, it was vetoed.

I agree with the last speaker, that it is my judgment if that bill had not been vetoed the impact of the depression would have been considerably relieved, because that bill had within its structure many provisions which would have gone a long way toward mitigating the situation along economic lines.

Now, I really feel, from what various speakers have said in regard to the members of the committee—the chairman, Mr. CONNERY, and the leader on the minority side, Mr. WELCH—that the committee has done a very fine and constructive piece of work, a piece of work for which every Member of the House ought to thank the members individually and the committee collectively.

I look to a situation arising in the country when this bill gets into operation and begins to function where it will be possible for a man looking for a job to get it, although it does not happen to be in the same town or in the same locality that he happens to be in.

Mr. HART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FORD. I yield.

Mr. HART. I confess that I do not know much about employment offices, but I want to ask the gentleman a question: Are there any employers today looking for men to employ and unable to find them?

Mr. FORD. There are.

Mr. HART. And if there are no jobs, how is the employment agency going to produce any?

Mr. FORD. I will say this, out of experience as a legislator, that in Los Angeles, wherever general constructive, scientific efforts were made to get men jobs, a special agency was able to produce 500 jobs in 3 weeks for 500 men out of work. The only thing that was necessary was coordination and cooperation between the men who wanted jobs and men who wanted to employ them.

Mr. HART. I want to say that if employers insert a notice in the newspaper in the morning, I will guarantee that there will be 10 men in the class in which the advertiser advertises the job. I want to know why we should appropriate a million and a half dollars to start and $4,000,000 to be matched by the States and how we are going to produce the jobs.

Mr. FORD. I only wish we were appropriating $4,000,000 now.

Mr. PEYSER. Will the gentleman from California allow me to answer the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. FORD. Certainly.

Mr. PEYSER. In the hearings on the bill it was brought out very clearly that where a manufacturer or employer advertised that he wanted a particular man he will have his mill gate crowded with applicants, but when he comes to look them over it may be that he wanted a puddler, and he will only find molders.

With the cooperation of the Federal office, however, with what information the employers will get from the State office through the Federal office, it is going to save lots of work and lots of time, and no fee for the man who wants the job.

Mr. HART. Does the gentleman mean to assume that a steel mill that wants puddlers and does not want molders has not got sense enough to advertise for puddlers?

Mr. PEYSER. I simply used puddlers as an illustration because it happened to come into my mind. It is the same in some other line.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KENNEY].

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, I have listened to this debate with a great deal of interest. My heart has been with this bill. I campaigned for it and advocated its purpose for the last few years. I am proud to have the privilege of speaking for it, and shortly, when it will have passed this House, I shall feel that something of great good has been accomplished. I believe it to be one of the measures most sorely needed by the people of our country.

I regard the bill as a companion measure to the National Recovery Act, which was passed by this House a few days ago. An eager people were looking to the Congress for the passage of that law which will create public works throughout the country and provide something which this country has until lately always had, jobs, not only for our own people, but for others from other lands. Jobs so thoroughly needed will be supplied by that bill.

Mr. HART. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KENNEY. Yes.

Mr. HART. If the gentleman has an oversupply of jobs on hand, I shall be very glad to send him over some of the people who are applying to me.

Mr. KENNEY. Mr. Chairman, it is true there is now what I might call an oversupply of demands for jobs. We want to make a supply for these demands. This companion bill, coming after the act providing for a comprehensive program of public work, in my opinion, will not only serve to distribute the jobs that are to come under the great public-works program, but it will also provide ways to take note and heed of what is going on in our country. We can remember back 4 years ago—when the warning was raised that unemployment was increasing to an alarming extent and it was urged that something should be done and done immediately, and above all that the Congress should consider the question of going into a public-works program to check the progress of unemployment—nothing was done by the Congress—and there followed a wake of disastrous consequences to our people. We will now have the employment agencies under this bill to deal with the jobs that will exist under the National Recovery Act. These agencies will also provide a means of keeping an eye on what is going on in the country; in that way they will not only be of direct service to the unemployed, but they will aid the Congress and the country in keeping informed on the employment situation so that they may better guard against a repetition of the spectacle of a wholesale dearth of jobs.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SHOEMAKER].

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, it is unnecessary to say a whole lot with regard to this bill. I particularly call attention to the specific fact that as an organizer and worker in the labor movement in this country for over 20 years, I know how hard it was 20 years ago to appear before a committee of Congress and receive the consideration that has been accorded to the working people in this bill. It was an impossibility. I believe that while this depression has caused a great deal of sorrow and suffering and grief and pain and anguish, it has, nevertheless, brought the hearts and minds of the common people together into one channel, and has resulted in considerable constructive thinking, in which the personal animosities that existed in the past have been more or less set aside.

Particularly at this time I wish to pay my respects to the wonderful work of the Committee on Labor and to all the members of the committee, and especially to the chairman of the committee, who has so valiantly and consistently battled in the interest of the common people.

Mr. CADY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Yes.

Mr. CADY. I hope the gentleman will pardon the intrusion, but I have been sitting here for some little time, hoping that some speaker would tell us just how the opening of these offices will provide employment. I do not want it understood that I am objecting to the employment of labor, and I do not want the chairman of this committee to feel in any way that I am not cognizant of the work that has been done in this matter. Everyone in the House appreciates that; but I should like to have some speaker, instead of throwing bouquets at the committee, tell us how they are going to provide jobs that are not existent.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the chairman of the committee to answer that question.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, this movement was initiated by President Wilson years ago. The idea is not to go out and get these jobs—I mean that they are now there—but with this public recovery bill getting along, this is to coordinate the jobs and not have a plumber running around wild over the city of Los Angeles looking for a plumber's job, when he could save his time by coming in one of these offices and learning that they want a plumber out in such-and-such a place, and go out and fill the job.

Mr. BLANTON. I will say to my friend from Michigan [Mr. CADY], answering his inquiry, that in the agricultural sections where farmers in a certain vicinity want thresher hands, or cotton choppers, or cotton pickers and harvest hands, they go to one of these offices and the offices know where the workers seeking that kind of employment can be found, and the employment office gets them together. If a cattleman wants to employ 25 or 50 men to help him round up his herd, to brand, or ship to market, the employment office can help him to get in touch with them.

Mr. KNUTSON. Does this come out of the gentleman's time?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, the gentleman's colleague from Minnesota knows how to take care of himself. He yielded to me. If a stockman wants helpers to shear his sheep or goats, he can find them. It is a coordinating office that gets the people who want employees together with the employees who want jobs.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, particularly at this time I want to pay my respects to the Ways and Means Committee for placing upon the Committee on Labor a Farmer-Laborite, one of my colleagues from Minnesota [Mr. LUNDEEN] who has consistently worked with this committee, and I think you Labor members on the committee have found his an asset rather than a liability.

Mr. CONNERY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. I yield.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman refers to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. LUNDEEN]?

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Yes.

Mr. CONNERY. The gentleman is a valued and wonderful member of that committee and we are very glad to have him there. [Applause.]

Mr. SHOEMAKER. This law will eliminate a very vicious system that has been going on among private employment agencies. They have had a habit of selling jobs for various contractors. The private employment agents have worked together with contractors, and they would hire men and send them out, charging a man $3 for the job and then send them out on the job. They would work about long enough to earn the $3 when they would be fired and then the employment agency would have another bunch coming.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SHOEMAKER] has expired.

Mr. WELCH. I yield the gentleman 1 additional minute, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. SHOEMAKER. In this manner the private employment agencies were able to keep practically 3 crews on the same job all the time; 1 crew going to the job, 1 crew on the job, and 1 crew leaving the job. It was just a system that fleeced labor and stole money from the poor fellows who did the work for the benefit of a certain contractor who had tied up with a certain employment agency.

This law will eliminate that and put the private employment agencies out of the way and furnish labor with jobs, especially itinerant labor which travels over the country, for instance, threshing in North Dakota, then picking corn in Iowa, and then from Iowa down to the South harvesting cotton, and then back up to the woods over the winter.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SHOEMAKER] has again expired.

Mr. WELCH. Mr. Chairman, I yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. CONNERY].

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself the balance of the time.

Mr. Chairman, the bill, I think, has been thoroughly explained this afternoon by the different speakers, members of the committee who rose in favor of the bill.

As I said, our idea is to coordinate the job with the man. We do not figure the United States is always going to be in a state of depression. We figure there are jobs to come. Some of them are already starting to come, I think, with the new administration. When we get these employment offices established, cooperating with the States, we will have an organization eventually in every State in the Union which will see to it that the men and the positions are coordinated; that a man can go to an agency, Federal and State combined, and tell what kind of a job he wants. They will tell him where that kind of a job is.

I dislike to take up further the time of the House. I understand there is another rule to be brought up this afternoon, so I yield back the balance of my time, Mr. Chairman, and ask that the bill be read.

The CHAIRMAN. All time has expired. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That (a) in order to promote the establishment and maintenance of a national system of public employment offices there is hereby created in the Department of Labor a bureau to be known as the "United States Employment Service", at the head of which shall be a director. The director shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall receive a salary at the rate of $8,500 per annum.

(b) Upon the expiration of 3 months after the enactment of this act the Employment Service now existing in the Department of Labor shall be abolished; and all records, files, and property (including office equipment) of the existing Employment Service shall thereupon be transferred to the United States Employment Service; and all the officers and employees of such service shall thereupon be transferred to the United States Employment Service created by this act without change in classification or compensation, but the term of office of any person transferred by this section to the United States Employment Service, and who was not appointed subject to the provisions of the Civil Service laws, shall expire upon the expiration of 6 months from the date of enactment of this act.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, this is a good bill and everybody recognizes that. I have not heard anyone say anything against it. My only reason for using 5 minutes of your time is that the other day when under a closed rule we considered the public works bill I did not have an opportunity to say what I wanted to say. I notice, however, that this bill gives me an opportunity to do that, because you are making here an appropriation of $5,500,000. I want to ask first where are you going to get that money. The next thing I want to do is to tell you where I think you ought to be able to get it. Next, I want to tell you that you cannot get it where you ought to get it, and then I want to tell you why you cannot get it there. I will take about 5 minutes to do that. The gentleman on the other side was kind enough to yield me time, but I was called out of the Chamber and was not here, so it is not his fault that I have to use this method to get the time.

There is no question but what you should get your excess taxes from these fellows who have been evading and defaulting. When Mitchell can evade $6,000,000, when Morgan and the other interests can beat their income taxes, that is the place you ought to get it. [Applause.] But let me say to my colleagues on the floor of this House that you cannot get it there, and I will tell you why you cannot get it. If you will get the income tax law and turn to the page that deals with limitations, you will find that in 1921 there began a conspiracy to defraud the Government of the United States out of its just tax money, and that today if you want to go back and sue for that money that they evaded and out of which they defrauded this country, you cannot do it under the law.

When the income tax law was passed in 1917, it had a 5-year period of limitation. For 5 years the Government could sue you for an evasion. When 1921 came along that was too long, and they cut the statute of limitations down to 4 years. Then in 1926 4 years was too much, and they cut it down to 3 years. In 1928 3 years was too much, and they cut it down to 2 years. Today, if you want to go back and sue those fellows who testified on their oaths that they have evaded their income tax, under the law written by this Congress you cannot do it.

In practically every State the statute of limitations is longer than 2 years. But if you evade the taxes owed the Government of the United States and they do not find it out for 2 years, you are scotfree so far as civil liability is concerned.

Now, I am introducing a bill to amend this section. I do not expect it to get very far, but it may do some good which will, if it can be done legally, make the limitation retroactive, allowing the Government 10 years to sue on the civil liability under those income-tax evasions of the last 10 years.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. I think that every one of those bills he mentions changing the limitation were drawn and specially prepared under the direction of Mr. Mellon and Mr. Mills; every one of them.

Mr. KNUTSON. Is the gentleman from Texas sure that Mr. Woodin did not have something to do with it?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, yes; I am absolutely sure he did not.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Of course, there is not much question in the minds of the people of the United States but what Mr. Mellon has been the President of the United States for the last 12 years, and undoubtedly it was under his supervision that these changes were made, until today, if you want to go back and collect the money out of which the United States was defrauded in those prosperous years, the law prohibits you from doing it.

You made the law. The power that made the law can change the law. This Congress ought to change that law so it can collect those back taxes. [Applause.]

The pro-forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Section 1, page 2, line 10, after the word "compensation", strike out to the period in line 15.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. The Secretary of Labor is authorized, in accordance with the Civil Service laws, to appoint and, in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, to fix the compensation of one or more assistant directors and such other officers, employees, and assistants, and to make such expenditures (including expenditures for personal services and rent at the seat of Government and elsewhere, and for law books, books of reference, and periodicals) as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this act.

With the following committee amendments:

Section 2, page 2, line 16, commencing with the word "in", strike out through the word "with", in line 17, and insert in lieu thereof the words "without regard to".

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, with this amendment and another one which is to be reported the bill will read as follows:

The Secretary of Labor is authorized, without regard to the Civil Service laws, to appoint and, without regard to the Classification Act of 1923, as amended—

And so forth.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment to section 2: Page 2, line 17, commencing with the word "in", strike out through the word "with", in line 18, and insert in lieu thereof the words "without regard to".

Mr. CONNERY. That is the other amendment of which I spoke.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment to section 2: Page 2, at the end of line 24, insert the following: "In case of appointments for service in the veterans' employment service provided for in section 3 of this act the Secretary shall appoint only veterans of wars of the United States."

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, this is self-explanatory. It means that in the veterans' offices the Secretary of Labor will be obliged to appoint veterans.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CARPENTER of Kansas. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I have not taken very much of the time of the House and do not expect to at this moment. I wish to discuss a matter that is in line with unemployment for 3 or 4 minutes, because when this bill comes up I probably will not have an opportunity to say anything.

Mr. Chairman, I arise to make this comment: We as a Nation, during the dark hours of the financial depression that we have been passing through the past 3 years and are now passing through, owe a great debt of gratitude to the labor of this country and especially to organized labor.

They have been true, loyal soldiers, making great sacrifices for their homes and country. It is noticeable we have had less labor trouble and fewer strikes than ever before during a period of like conditions, and during such period labor has suffered more and taken more on the jaw than anyone else. Why have they cooperated with this country to such a great extent? Because of their patriotism and for the reason, first of all, they are true, loyal American citizens. American labor is the last one who wants any communism in this country; it is fighting it harder than anyone else. We cannot therefore pass laws that will result in more unemployment. We should not pass a railroad law that will result in fewer jobs on the railroad. The railroad employees are our finest and highest type of citizen; they have been reduced and cut time after time. When this panic first struck the country and the heads of the railroads met here in Washington with President Hoover, they announced they would not discharge their employees, when as a matter of fact they were discharging them then and continued to do so in increasing numbers in direct violation of this agreement. The railroad brotherhoods and other railroad labor organizations have met every trying situation with great fortitude. They have taken care, through their lodge dues and contributions, of their unfortunate brothers. They are at the end of their rope. It is absolutely impossible for them to take care of and provide for all discharged railroad employees.

We are soon to consider the railroad bill, and if we pass this bill let us pass it with such amendments as will give the utmost protection to the railroad employees and the public. [Applause.]

The pro-forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. (a) It shall be the province and duty of the bureau to promote and develop a national system of employment offices for men, women, and juniors who are legally qualified to engage in gainful occupations, to maintain a farm-placement service, to maintain a public employment service for the District of Columbia, to cooperate with the Veterans' Administration in securing employment for veterans and, in the manner hereinafter provided, to assist in establishing and maintaining systems of public employment offices in the several States and the political subdivisions thereof. The bureau shall also assist in coordinating the public employment offices throughout the country and in increasing their usefulness by developing and prescribing minimum standards of efficiency, assisting them in meeting problems peculiar to their localities, promoting uniformity in their administrative and statistical procedure, furnishing and publishing information as to opportunities for employment and other information of value in the operation of the system, and maintaining a system for clearing labor between the several States.

(b) Whenever in this act the word "State" or "States" is used it shall be understood to include the Territory of Hawaii.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 3, in line 4, after the word "occupations", insert "to maintain a veterans' service to be devoted to securing employment for veterans."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment: Page 3, line 6, after the word "Columbia", strike out to the word "and" in line 8.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, the language stricken reads: "to cooperate with the Veterans' Administration in securing employment for the veterans." The language of the previous amendment to maintain veterans' offices makes this unnecessary.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer another committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. CONNERY: Page 3, line 11, after the word "thereof", insert the words "in which there shall be located a veterans' employment service."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. DIMOND: On page 3, line 22, after the word "the", strike out the words "Territory of Hawaii" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Territories of Hawaii and Alaska."

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Chairman, the amendment is very plain. We simply wish to have the Territory of Alaska included with the Territory of Hawaii in order to receive the benefits of this bill. The gracious gentleman from Massachusetts has said he has no objection to the amendment and the amendment was actually prepared by my friend the gentleman from California [Mr. WELCH], so I think there is no necessity to speak upon the amendment further.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I will be pleased to accept the amendment, but I dislike to see Puerto Rico left out. I wonder if the gentleman could change the amendment to read "Territories."

Mr. KNUTSON. If the gentleman will yield, Puerto Rico is not a Territory, and that change would not include Puerto Rico. There are only two Territories. The others are insular possessions.

Mr. CONNERY. Then I withdraw my suggestion, Mr. Chairman, and I shall be pleased to accept the amendment if the Committee agrees to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question. In section 3 there are several references to "the Bureau", for instance, in line 2, line 11, and so on. There has been no definition of a bureau theretofore mentioned in the bill.

Mr. CONNERY. Yes; on page 1 there is the language—

That (a) in order to promote the establishment and maintenance of a national system of public employment offices there is hereby created in the Department of Labor a bureau to be known as the United States Employment Service.

Mr. GOSS. So the word "bureau" in all of these sections refers to that particular bureau?

Mr. CONNERY. To that particular bureau in the Department of Labor; yes.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. In order to obtain the benefits of appropriations apportioned under section 5, a State shall, through its legislature, accept the provisions of this act and designate or authorize the creation of a State agency vested with all powers necessary to cooperate with the United States Employment Service under this act. If the legislature of any State has not made provision for accepting the provisions of this act, the Governor of such State may, insofar as he is authorized to do so by the laws of such State, accept the provisions of this act and designate or create a State agency to cooperate with the United States Employment Service until 6 months after the adjournment of the first regular session of the legislature in such State following the passage of this act.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. CONNERY: On page 4, line 4, after the word "act", strike out to the period in line 12.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I may say that we have language in another amendment which will be offered later which clarifies this entire situation with reference to the States, providing that if the legislatures agree to take advantage of the provisions of this act at their first meeting, then they shall receive the benefits of the legislation.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 9. Each State agency cooperating with the United States Employment Service under this act shall make such reports concerning its operations and expenditures as shall be prescribed by the Director. It shall be the duty of the Director to ascertain whether the system of public employment offices maintained in each State is conducted in accordance with the rules and regulations and the standards of efficiency prescribed by the Director in accordance with the provisions of this act. The Director may revoke any existing certificates or withhold any further certificate provided for in section 7, whenever he shall determine, as to any State, that the cooperating State agency has not properly expended the moneys paid to it or the moneys herein required to be appropriated by such State, in accordance with plans approved under this act. Before any such certificate shall be revoked or withheld from any State, the director shall give notice in writing to the State agency stating specifically wherein the State has failed to comply with such plans. The State agency may appeal to the Secretary of Labor from the action of the director in any such case, and the Secretary of Labor may either affirm or reverse the action of the director with such directions as he shall consider proper.

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Committee amendment offered by Mr. CONNERY: On page 9, line 4, after the word "proper", insert section 10, as follows:

"SEC. 10. During the current fiscal year and the 2 succeeding fiscal years the director is authorized to expend in any State so much of the sum apportioned to such State according to population, and so much of the unapportioned balance of the appropriation made under the provisions of section 5 as he may deem necessary, as follows:

"(a) In States where there is no State system of public employment offices, in establishing and maintaining a system of public employment offices under the control of the director.

"(b) In States where there is a State system of public employment offices, but where the State has not complied with the provisions of section 4, in establishing a cooperative Federal and State system of public employment offices to be maintained by such officer or board and in such manner as may be agreed upon by and between the Governor of the State and the director.

"The authority contained in this section shall terminate at the expiration of the period specified in the first paragraph of this section, and thereafter no assistance shall be rendered such States until the legislatures thereof provide for cooperation with the United States Employment Service as provided in section 4 of this act."

Mr. CONNERY. Mr. Chairman, this is the amendment that provides that the States may receive this aid during the interim or until their legislatures meet. When the legislatures meet and take advantage of this provision and say they will subscribe to the legislation, then they can have their own employment offices.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk completed the reading of the bill.

The following committee amendments were reported:

Page 9, line 5, strike out the figure "10" and insert "11."
Page 10, line 3, strike out "11" and insert "12."
Page 10, line 7, strike out "12" and insert "13."

The Committee amendments were agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rule the Committee automatically rises.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the Chair, Mr. HASTINGS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee had had under consideration the bill S. 510, to provide for the establishment of a national employment system, and for cooperation with the States in the promotion of such system, and for other purposes, and had directed him to report the same back with sundry amendments, with the recommendation that the amendments be agreed to and the bill as amended to pass.

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the previous question is ordered. Is a separate vote demanded on any amendment?

There being no demand for a separate vote, the amendments were agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CONNERY, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

The bill H.R. 4559 was laid on the table.

THE PROGRESSIVE NATIONAL EMPLOYMENT BILL—EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. SMITH of Washington. Mr. Speaker, this is legislation which Senator WAGNER, of New York, has championed for the past 3 years and which was passed by a former Congress and vetoed by then President Hoover.

This bill is reported out unanimously by our great Committee on Labor, which in itself is sufficient to recommend it to our favorable consideration. Any measure which is endorsed by Chairman CONNERY and his associates is certain to be progressive and in the interests of labor and beneficial to the masses, who produce the wealth and make possible the comfort and happiness of all the people.

I hope and believe that this bill, if properly administered, will do much to end the flagrant abuses and vicious practices of the private employment agencies in this country. It will provide a medium of contact between the employer and the employee, tend to stabilize employment, and assemble statistical facts and information to preclude the recurring periodical cycles of unemployment with which we have been cursed in the past. I hope this bill will pass without a dissenting vote.

EXTEND TIME FOR FINAL PROOF BY HOMESTEAD ENTRYMEN

Mr. DEROUEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H.R. 5239) to extend the provisions of the act entitled "An act to extend the period of time during which final proof may be offered by homestead entrymen", approved May 13, 1932, to desert-land entrymen, and for other purposes, and that the bill be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act entitled "An act to extend the period of time during which final proof may be offered by homestead entrymen", approved May 13, 1932, is amended to read as follows:

"That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to extend for not exceeding 2 years the period during which final proof may be offered by any person who has a pending homestead or desert-land entry upon public lands of the United States on which at the date of this act or on any date on or prior to December 31, 1934, under existing law, final proof is required, showing residence, cultivation, improvements, expenditures, or payment of purchase money as the case may be: Provided, That any such entryman shall be required to show that it is a hardship upon himself to meet the requirements incidental to final proof upon the date required by existing law due to adverse weather or economic conditions: And provided further, That this act shall apply only to cases where adequate relief is not available under existing law.

"SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to make such rules and regulations as are necessary to carry out the purposes of this act."

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 1, after the word "which", insert "annual or."
Page 2, line 3, after the word "law", insert "annual or."
Page 2, line 8, after the words "incidental to", add "annual or."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. DEROUEN, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ONE YEAR'S SEA PAY TO SURPLUS GRADUATES OF NAVAL ACADEMY

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the bill (H.R. 5012) to amend existing law in order to obviate the payment of 1 year's sea pay to surplus graduates of the Naval Academy, for printing under the rule.

OFFICIAL CONDUCT OF HALSTED L. RITTER

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to consider in the House, as in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, House Resolution 163, which is a privileged resolution, and which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 163

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary is authorized and directed, as a whole or by subcommittee, to inquire into and investigate the official conduct of Halsted L. Ritter, a district judge for the United States District Court for the Southern District of Florida, to determine whether in the opinion of said committee he has been guilty of any high crime or misdemeanor which in the contemplation of the Constitution requires the interposition of the Constitutional powers of the House. Said committee shall report its findings to the House, together with such resolution of impeachment or other recommendation as it deems proper.

SEC. 2. For the purpose of this resolution, the committee is authorized to sit and act during the present Congress at such times and places in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearing, to employ such clerical, stenographic, and other assistance, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, and to take such testimony, to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures, not exceeding $5,000, as it deems necessary.

With the following committee amendments:

Page 2, line 5, strike out the words "to employ such clerical, stenographic, and other assistance"; and in line 9, on page 2, strike out "to have such printing and binding done, and to make such expenditures, not exceeding $5,000."

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman say that this is a privileged resolution?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes; but I am asking now unanimous consent that it be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. WARREN. Do I understand that the resolution has been reported striking out those lines that would be subject to a point of order?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. It does strike out all the proposed appropriation.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object to ask some questions. This is more than a request that the resolution be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. It is asking for immediate consideration, and in the House as in Committee of the Whole, because otherwise it would not be in order and would necessitate calling up a rule; but I want to ask my colleague from Texas some questions. The striking out of all of this language which limits the expense to $5,000 leaves the expense open and unlimited. We want all expenses properly limited.

Mr. GREEN. Oh, there will be no expense.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, there is always expense involved in investigating the conduct of a Federal judge, and there will be expense down in Florida. However, I am not uneasy about my colleague from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS] incurring unreasonable expense if he is going to look after this matter himself and keep the expense within bounds. I think the whole Congress owes a debt of gratitude to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS]. In the last investigation he made, on a 3 weeks' investigation, instead of sending in a bill of several thousand dollars, he ended with a bill of less than $200 for his expenses. That is commendable, and I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not he is going to keep these expenses within the $5,000?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. For investigation?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; the expenses under this resolution.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I can assure my colleague—and I know that I can do it—that the expenses will not be half of $5,000.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my reservation of objection.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Do I understand that all the provisions for expenses have been stricken out of this resolution?

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Does this come with a unanimous report from the Committee on the Judiciary?

Mr. HOOPER. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will allow me, it is a unanimous report as far as the committee is concerned—not the entire committee, but practically so. In addition to that, I would be the last person in the House to sanction an assault upon the Federal judiciary which seems to be in the air in the House at this time, but I do believe that this is a matter where a good prima facie case has been made out for an investigation.

Mr. SNELL. I think we ought to have notice of when matters of this kind are going to be brought up. I do not think they should be brought in here and passed hastily by unanimous consent.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I am perfectly willing to let it go over if the gentleman desires.

Mr. SNELL. No; not this time. But I think in future that notice should be given to us when matters of this kind are to be brought up.

Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. I think the gentleman is right about that as a matter of practice.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent that the resolution be considered in the House as in Committee of the Whole. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The Clerk again reported the resolution and the committee amendments.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the adoption of the resolution.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

A motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

RELIEF OF EXISTING NATIONAL EMERGENCY IN RELATION TO INTERSTATE RAILROAD TRANSPORTATION, ETC.

Mr. POU, from the Committee on Rules, submitted the following privileged resolution (H.Res. 169) for printing under the rule:

House Resolution 169

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 1580, an act to relieve the existing national emergency in relation to interstate railroad transportation, and to amend sections 5, 15a, and 19a of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended; and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 3 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the Chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider, without the intervention of any point of order, the substitute committee amendment recommended by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce now in the bill, and such substitute, for the purpose of amendment, shall be considered under the 5-minute rule as an original bill. At the conclusion of such consideration the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and any Member may demand a separate vote in the House on any of the amendments adopted in the Committee of the Whole to the bill or committee substitute. The previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion, except one motion to recommit.

INVESTIGATION OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I call up the resolution H.Res. 146.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 146

Resolved, That for the purpose of obtaining information necessary as a basis for legislation, the Committee on Civil Service, as a whole or by subcommittee, is authorized to investigate the Civil Service Commission, the heads of all the departments, commissions, and independent offices, to determine whether the third paragraph of section 2 of the act of January 16, 1883, being "An act to regulate and improve the Civil Service of the United States", as follows:

"Third, appointments to the public service aforesaid in the departments at Washington shall be apportioned among the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia upon the basis of population as ascertained at the last preceding census", has been enforced and whether each State has its quota of Federal employees in the District of Columbia in the several departments, commissions, or independent offices, as required by said act.

The committee shall report to the House the results of its investigation, including such recommendation for legislation as it deems advisable.

The committee or any subcommittee thereof is authorized to hold such hearings, within the District of Columbia, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, and to take such testimony and report its recommendations to the House.

With the following committee amendment:

On page 2, in line 11, after the word "hearings" insert "within the District of Columbia."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask some questions. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. BLANTON. I should like to say to the gentleman from Georgia, that while I am in sympathy with the purpose of the resolution 100 percent, I should like for him to state what is the necessity of passing it? My friend from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] put in the RECORD on May 10 (p. 3195) authentic statistics and figures showing just exactly the quota of Civil Service employees due each State and the District of Columbia and the number of Civil Service employees employed from each State and from the District of Columbia. He then showed the amount of the quota that was short in the various States and the amount of the quota that was specially long in three States and the District of Columbia. For instance, if I remember correctly, the District of Columbia was entitled to 132 Civil Service employees. Yet the District of Columbia has had 10,778 people placed in positions, and thus has 10,646 more employees given positions than it is entitled to, while from the entire State of Texas only 433 Texans have been given positions. This is not fair. Now, those figures are authentic. That data is correct. The Senate of the United States is familiar with that data. There is now pending in the Senate, as the gentleman knows, our House bill to correct it.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MAPES. I wonder how the gentleman from Texas got the floor?

Mr. BLANTON. My friend from Georgia yielded to me. He is in charge of the time.

Mr. COX. I cannot yield to the gentleman to make a speech.

Mr. BLANTON. But I wanted to get through with this question. [Laughter.] When the Senate knows of those facts, and we have a proper bill there to remedy the situation, why do we allow the Senate to amend it? Why do we not make our fight on that amendment? If the Senate does change it when it comes back here let us stand pat and require these inequities to be remedied and not spend our time and money uselessly in investigating.

Mr. COX. The purpose of the resolution is to enlarge the power of the Committee on the Civil Service and to authorize it to sit while the Congress is not in sesison.

Mr. BLANTON. What is the use of the committee sitting and getting facts that we already know?

Mr. COX. It is the purpose to get information to be used as a basis for legislation, if from those facts the committee finds it necessary.

Mr. BLANTON. I am in favor of the committee sitting from now until January if it takes that to give the States their just quotas, and they will produce legislation to correct this situation.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WARREN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. WARREN. Is this going to be followed by another resolution asking for an appropriation?

Mr. COX. I take it, Mr. Speaker, that the Committee on the Civil Service may have to come with a resolution asking for an appropriation to meet expenses necessary to carry on its work later on. Let me say to the gentleman, the resolution provides that the sittings of the committee and the hearings which it conducts shall take place in the city of Washington. I take it if there is any expense incident to the hearings, it will be very little.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COX. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am the author of the resolution. Let me say the hearings will all be held in the District of Columbia, and it is not contemplated there will be any expense at all. The hearings will be conducted by the House Committee on the Civil Service. All of the witnesses who are expected to appear before the committee are in the District of Columbia, and it is not expected there will be any requests for any appropriation.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, there is a feeling in this House to the effect that the Civil Service Commission has not, in good faith, undertaken to put into effect that provision of the act amending the Civil Service Act, which provides that appointments to public service in the departments in Washington shall be apportioned among the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia upon the basis of population as ascertained at the last preceding census. Rather than undertaking to carry out this provision of the act there is a feeling here that the Commission has intentionally carried on its work in such a way as to defeat the purpose of the law. An examination of the records will make disclosures that seemingly give complete justification for the conviction that the Commission has not acted in good faith. For instance, the District of Columbia at the present time is entitled to 131 places, and it has 10,695. The State of New York is entitled to 3,400 places, and it has but 1,864. Virginia is entitled to 654, and it has 2,251. New Jersey, entitled to 1,092, has but 406. Georgia, entitled to 786, has 382. In other words, the Commission has gone about the performance of its work in such manner as to indicate that it has a feeling that these places in the city of Washington belong to the District of Columbia and to neighboring States.

If I know the sentiment of this House, it is that these places shall be apportioned in accordance with the provision of law. I believe it to be the determination of Congress that equitable treatment shall be given all of the States, and that the Congress is going to have this kind of treatment, if it be even at the expense of repealing our Civil Service law. [Applause.]

Mr. Speaker, I want to say for myself and upon my own responsibility, that I believe the Civil Service is responsible for more deadheading, for more inefficiency, and for more disloyalty to the Government than all other agencies, public and private, combined. [Applause.] The Civil Service Commission has coming to it all the unfavorable implications that arise out of the adoption of this resolution, for it is a protest against the manner in which the Commission has done its work.

I believe this resolution ought to pass, that the investigation ought to be made, believing there will be forthcoming suggestions of legislation that will cure the evils which everybody knows exist.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. COX. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. What else is back of this resolution, considering the fact that in practically every piece of legislation you have passed this session you made a special provision doing away with the Civil Service requirements as for the appointment of individuals to these positions? Within 15 minutes you have just struck out of a bill a provision for the appointment under Civil Service Act of the employees needed to carry out the legislation; and, considering that you do not intend to pay any attention to the Civil Service Act, why is there any necessity for this resolution at the present time?

Mr. HASTINGS. If the gentleman from Georgia will permit, I may say to the gentleman from New York there are about 33,000 Civil Service positions here in Washington. The act of January 16, 1883, enacted 50 years ago, provided that these places should be apportioned among the States in accordance with the population.

Mr. SNELL. I grant that. The gentleman has all that information at the present time. If it is anything more the committee needs they can get it by calling up the Civil Service Commission with practically no expense or trouble.

Mr. HASTINGS. And we do not intend to incur any expense in the investigation.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman from Georgia himself said they proposed to go to the Committee on Accounts for authorization to make expenditures.

Mr. COX. That statement was made by me without having consulted the chairman of the committee. I naturally expected that if the committee summoned witnesses and conducted hearings that it would incur some small expense.

Mr. SNELL. The Chairman of the Civil Service Commission can give the committee this information without a particle of expense.

Mr. HASTINGS. If the gentleman from Georgia will yield further, we do not expect any expense to be incurred in connection with it except the expense of stenographically taking the testimony. It is expected that the House committee, if it conducts an investigation, will call before it members of the Civil Service Commission and the heads of departments and others who have information, for the purpose of making inquiry why this law has not been carried into effect for the past 50 years.

Mr. SNELL. If that is all the committee intends to do it does not need this resolution. It has that power at the present time.

Mr. BLANTON. Not to sit in vacation.

Mr. SNELL. Any man in the service of the Government will respond when a committee of Congress asks him to come before it.

Mr. BLANTON. If they are going to do a thorough job, they must sit in vacation, and to do that they must have authority.

Mr. SNELL. If they are to sit in vacation, that is another thing.

Mr. BLANTON. That is what they intend to do.

Mr. SNELL. I want to know the reason why these gentlemen are so much interested in Civil Service at the present time. This has not been brought out. There is something behind this bill, for so far this session the only interest shown is to do away with it.

Mr. HASTINGS. I have been trying to tell the gentleman from New York that according to the records the State of California is entitled to a certain number of employees and has but 22 percent of its quota. Texas is entitled to a certain number and has but 27 percent of its quota. Oklahoma has but 30 percent of its quota.

We have had this law on the statute books for 50 years, and it has been evaded by the Civil Service Commission. What we want to do is to call them before the committee, place them under oath, take testimony, and then determine why this law has been evaded. Then, if it is found necessary to strengthen the law, the committee, of course, is authorized to report such legislation back to the House.

Mr. SNELL. The committee has that information. The committee has the facts. What else is there behind it?

Mr. HASTINGS. The hearings may develop a method by which the Civil Service law can be strengthened.

Mr. SNELL. The Democrats in power now do not intend to follow the Civil Service law, and the gentleman knows they do not. Why is the gentleman worried about the Civil Service law?

Mr. HASTINGS. The gentleman from New York will admit that the spirit of this law has been evaded and that the various States of this Union have not been fairly dealt with.

Mr. SNELL. What right have you got to call them to task for not obeying the Civil Service law when every single bill you have passed here in the House says it is not necessary to obey it? When you yourselves are doing everything possible to destroy it?

Mr. HASTINGS. That is new legislation.

Mr. SNELL. You did that again 15 minutes ago here in this House.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman permit me to answer?

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman has the floor.

Mr. COX. There has been no legislation to the effect that the Civil Service laws should not be enforced. There has been legislation providing that places to be distributed should not come under the Civil Service rules.

Mr. SNELL. Certainly.

Mr. COX. But nothing has been said that the Civil Service regulations should be suspended.

Mr. SNELL. Does not the gentleman call it suspending them when an organization of 5,000 employees is set up and the law setting them up says they need not come under Civil Service regulations? That has been done in every important job-creating bill passed this session. You did it today. You will do it again tomorrow in the railroad bill.

Mr. COX. No; it just simply states that the work shall not be under the Civil Service.

Mr. SNELL. Certainly; so you can make purely political appointments, and that is what you have been doing with respect to every one of these bills.

Mr. BANKHEAD. If the gentleman will permit, I may say to the gentleman from New York that in all probability the reason these recent provisions have been put in the bill is because of knowledge of the fact that the Civil Service Commission itself has been violating existing law.

Mr. SNELL. That is not the real reason, and the gentleman from Alabama knows it just as well as I do.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Since the gentleman from New York expresses such great solicitude about the matter——

Mr. SNELL. I am not expressing solicitude, I am trying to get information.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Well, I will say since the gentleman has been informed that there will be no expense incident to the investigation——

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman will recall that the gentleman from Georgia who presented the resolution said there would probably be some expense.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Surely, then, since the House is sufficiently interested to direct that the committee make an investigation this should carry with it a good deal of force and should be a complete answer to the question the gentleman from New York asks. Within the scope of this investigation, I am inclined to think that since some question has been raised as to whether the law has been carried out in good faith relative to appointments within the District, it would be well within the powers of the committee to ask of witnesses, qualified to give the facts, the number in the unclassified service from the different States. It might be very informing to the gentleman to have such information.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. If you intend to honestly and fairly enforce the Civil Service law, I think it is all right; but, certainly, from your acts so far in this special session of Congress you have not given the impression to the country that you intend to pay any attention to the Civil Service law. Is not that the fact, honestly?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman will find out when this investigation has been completed.

Mr. SNELL. That is not answering my question.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. May I say to the gentleman that he is speaking without accurate information and my answers to questions he asks would also be without information further than what the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS] has already given the House. The gentleman will find, I think, that there will be very interesting data disclosed both as to appointments in the classified and unclassified services. I venture to predict that the gentleman will find there has been some favoritism shown to the political party in power since 1921, and of which he is a member.

Mr. SNELL. Let me say to the gentleman that I have accurate information that 15 minutes ago you struck out the Civil Service provision in regard to the new employment bureau that you are going to set up, and will employ hundreds of employees. That is accurate information, is it not?

Mr. COX. Is the gentleman satisfied with the work of the Civil Service Commission so far as it affects the State of New York?

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman said I did not have accurate information. I am talking about what you have done on these important bills, and to that extent my information is accurate.

Mr. COX. Is the gentleman satisfied with the work of the Civil Service Commission insofar as it affects the State of New York?

Mr. SNELL. I am frank to say I do not know very much about it, and if that was all you had in mind I would not care.

Mr. COX. If New York is entitled to 2,400 places here in the District of Columbia and only has 1,800——

Mr. SNELL. You have that information, you have the law, and all that has to be done is for the Civil Service Committee of the House to see that the law is followed. You have full control and you can make your own people abide by the law.

Mr. GREEN. This is one of the ways we are trying to do that, and does not the gentleman believe that the States that have not their quota ought to have them?

Mr. SNELL. I agree to that, and I have no objection to that.

Mr. GREEN. That is what we are trying to do and my people want positions.

Mr. COX. May I inquire of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] if he would like me to yield to him now?

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield to me for just one moment?

Mr. COX. If the other gentleman will defer a moment; yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to state to the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] that he has overlooked what this resolution provides in that it authorizes this committee "to make such recommendations for legislation as it deems advisable."

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. They can make that recommendation now. They have all the information available, and the gentleman knows they have it. They need no new authority to recommend changes in the law.

Mr. BLANTON. But without this resolution that authorizes it they cannot sit after this Congress adjourns on the 10th—and we are hoping to adjourn on the 10th.

Mr. SNELL. They cannot pass any legislation then, anyway.

Mr. BLANTON. But they can ascertain facts and make recommendations. We want to authorize them to sit during the vacation.

Mr. SNELL. Then it is going to cost some money, and the gentleman on your own side said it would not cost anything.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, unless something more is intended by this resolution than appears on its face, it is wholly unnecessary and useless; but, as has been suggested in the colloquy between the gentleman from New York and others on the Democratic side, probably more is intended than is shown on its face. The gentleman from Georgia, in the course of his remarks, said something to the effect that—> the Civil Service Commission is entitled to such a riding as this committee is prepared or proposes to give it.

If this resolution is for the purpose of riding the Civil Service Commission, that is one thing. If it is for the purpose of getting the information which the resolution refers to, then it is entirely unnecessary because the Civil Service Commission can give the information to anyone within a few minutes. It is available at the office of the Commission upon request.

Yesterday afternoon, about 4 o'clock, I called the Commission over the telephone and asked if I could get the information the resolution calls for or authorizes the Civil Service Committee to get. This morning before 11 o'clock there was delivered to my office a statement giving all the information asked for as of the close of business yesterday afternoon. The statement is as follows:

As the information is so readily available to anyone, it may be assumed that the purpose of the resolution is now, as stated by the gentleman from Georgia, to give the Civil Service Committee a chance to ride the Civil Service Commission, or, as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] disclosed, to inquire about the unclassified service as well as the classified. It is quite probable that the sponsors of the resolution are more interested in the unclassified Civil Service than they are in the classified.

As the gentleman from New York has pointed out, there has been a persistent policy through this session of Congress to inject into all special legislation that has been passed a provision to take out of the classified Civil Service the positions created thereby to such an extent that the friends of the merit system have become alarmed.

The same subject matter embraced in this resolution has been gone into several times in recent years. I am told by the gentleman from New York [Mr. TABER] that the matter was gone into by the Committee on Appropriations in the hearings held recently on the independent offices bill. Three or four years ago a Senate committee went over the same matter, and I have here a pamphlet issued by the Civil Service Commission, dated January 1932, which treats of the entire matter in detail.

The people from the States distant from the District of Columbia have not cared to leave their homes to take the positions in the Government service in the District of Columbia. They have not taken the necessary examinations to get on the eligible lists.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. RANSLEY. Mr. Speaker, I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. MAPES. Furthermore, legislation has been passed from time to time giving veterans a preference when it came to making up the eligible lists and in making appointments so that it has been impossible for the Civil Service Commisison to apportion the employees in the District according to the population of the States. I have before me here a copy of the hearings before the Senate committee to which I have referred. The then chairman of the Commission, Mr. William C. Deming, appeared before that committee at that time and among other things said:

> So far as the disparity in the State apportionment of appointments is concerned, the Commission is able and ready to state the full reasons why the disparity exists, to point out its constant efforts to maintain approximate equality in the apportionment, and, of course, to give to the committee of the Senate any other information regarding its work that is available or can be made so.
> The Civil Service Commission is not interested in the residents of one State above those of another. The Commission is wholly in favor of the apportionment provision of the Civil Service law. It is beyond the power of the Commission, however, to create eligibles from the States that are in arrears under the apportionment. If the residents of the States in arrears are not sufficiently interested in positions in the departmental service at Washington to apply for them and become eligible for appointment, after having had due notice of examinations and full opportunity to enter them, they cannot reasonably object if residents of other States who have applied are examined and appointed. The vacancies must be filled. The Civil Service Commission has no alternative, but is required to certify for appointment the available eligibles, regardless of their residence.
> The purpose of Government employment is not to provide places for individuals but to transact the public business. If some States do not supply the workers, others must.

He then goes on to say that when examinations are to be held, the Commission sends notices of them to every postmaster in the United States, asking the postmaster not only to place a copy of the same on the bulletin board in his office but to notify the newspapers of them as well, so as to give as much publicity about them as possible. It is not the fault of the Commission that more have not taken the examinations and qualified. What more can the Commission do and what more facts can the Civil Service Committee of the House of Representatives ascertain than are already available?

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does the gentleman know that in his State of Michigan only 32 percent of the Michigan quota is employed? Does not the gentleman believe that in the State of Michigan there are plenty of well-qualified men and women to fill that quota 100 percent; and does he not believe that his constituents and the people of Michigan are desirous of having their quota filled to the limit?

Mr. MAPES. I know from the information the Civil Service Commission furnished me this morning that at the close of business last night Michigan's quota was 1,305.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has again expired.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I yield 5 minutes more.

Mr. MAPES. And that it actually had only 440 employees in the Government service in the District of Columbia.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is 33 percent.

Mr. MAPES. About that; but the gentleman has all that information now.

Mr. HASTINGS. We want to know why the law is not complied with, and the only way that we can do that is through an investigation of how it is being administered by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. MAPES. But the resolution only asks for the facts, and the common sense of the gentleman from Oklahoma will tell him why the law cannot be fully complied with. It it because the people of Oklahoma and other States until the last few years have not qualified, have not cared to enter the Government service in the District of Columbia. They have preferred to enter the Government service either in their home States or to remain in private business.

Mr. HASTINGS. That does not answer the question.

Mr. MAPES. And it should not be lost sight of that only about 6 or 7 percent of the classified civil service of the Government comes within the District of Columbia. The rest is in the gentleman's State and in other States. As far as possible local people are selected to fill local jobs.

The gentleman will find that the passage of this resolution will not produce any more information than is now available to anyone upon the asking.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then, why does the gentleman object to the passage of the resolution and having a fair investigation by a committee of this House, without any expense, here in the District of Columbia?

Mr. MAPES. I object to doing useless things, and I object to the inference in this resolution, criticizing and finding fault with the Civil Service Commission, when it is not at fault at all.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman is aware of the fact that when a Civil Service examination is held and a register established, such register does not die with the filling of the vacancies that then exist, but it is continued on.

Mr. MAPES. Oh, not indefinitely.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Well, for quite awhile.

Mr. MAPES. For 1 year.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. But the gentleman is further aware that oftentimes there are many in a State like Michigan and other States with an under quota that would like to have a new examination held so that citizens of such States may have an opportunity to qualify.

Mr. MAPES. But there are very few on the eligible lists now, because examinations have not been held recently. I should like to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that when the Commission is requested to furnish appointing officers with a list of eligibles, if the States that are behind in their quotas have people on the eligible list, those people are certified to the appointing officers, rather than eligibles from States that have more than their quota.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman believe that to be the case?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. COX. Does the gentleman not understand that the Commission has been reducing those places credited to States that are under their quota all along? For instance, the State of New Jersey in July 1932 was entitled to 1,256 places and it has but 465. In July 1933 entitled to 1,032, and, instead of letting it remain at 465, they took away 59 more from them.

Mr. MAPES. The gentleman is questioning the accuracy of my statement.

Mr. COX. No. I do not question the accuracy of the gentleman's statement. I asked the gentleman if he understood that to be the fact.

Mr. MAPES. Just a minute and I will answer the gentleman. Somewhere in the documents I have here the very definite statement is made that, in certifying the list of eligibles for vacancies, if there are eligibles from States that have not used all of their quota, the eligibles from these States are certified, and not ones from the States where the quota has been exceeded.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] has expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JEFFERS] for the purpose of offering an amendment.

Mr. JEFFERS. I offer an amendment, Mr. Speaker, which I send to the desk.

Mr. SNELL. How can an amendment be offered under the rule?

Mr. COX. The resolution itself is privileged.

Mr. SNELL. Is it an open resolution, so that anybody may offer amendments as they see fit?

Mr. BLANTON. The chairman certainly has the right to yield for the purpose of offering an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JEFFERS].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. JEFFERS: Page 2, line 10, strike out lines 10 to 14 and insert in lieu thereof the following: "The said committee, or any subcommittee thereof, is authorized to sit and act at such times and places within the District or Columbia, whether or not the House is sitting, has recessed, or has adjourned, to hold such hearings, to require the attendance of such witnesses and the production of such books, papers, and documents, by subpena or otherwise, and to take such testimony as it deems necessary. Subpenas may be issued under the signature of the Chairman of the Civil Service Committee or of the chairman of any subcommittee, and shall be served by any person designated by any of them. The chairman of the committee or any member thereof may administer oaths to witnesses. Every person who, having been summoned as a witness by authority of said committee or any subcommittee thereof, wilfully makes default, or who, having appeared, refuses to answer any question pertinent to the investigation heretofore authorized, shall be held to the penalties provided by section 102 of the Revised Statutes of the United States."

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state the point of order.

Mr. SNELL. I did not understand the amendment very clearly. As I understand, this provides for holding examinations and investigations outside the District of Columbia.

Mr. JEFFERS. No, no; within the District of Columbia. If the gentleman will reserve his point of order.

Mr. SNELL. I will reserve the point of order.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Speaker, as Chairman of the Civil Service Committee to which this investigation is assigned, I have looked over this resolution, and I find it needs to be strengthened in some respects, and that is the object of this amendment.

The amendment provides, for one thing, that if the chairman of the committee or any subcommittee thereof deems it necessary, they may have the power of administering oaths to witnesses. That authority is not in the resolution, but should be.

Mr. SNELL. I withdraw the point of order.

Mr. JEFFERS. It still confines the investigation to the District of Columbia. There is no change in that.

Now, let me say to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES], a great many of the things which he has pointed out regarding the Commission are true, particularly with regard to information which we have been able to secure in the past without such resolution as this. The Committee on Civil Service has for some time been giving consideration to the matter of trying to work out something which can later be written into law to help the Civil Service Commission to work out some of the complications they have run into in the past, so that they can administer the law with better results. We are not unduly critical of the Commission. We desire to help them.

This resolution gives the authority to the Civil Service Committee to administer oaths and to sit while Congress is not in session. Therefore, this resolution is absolutely necessary.

Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Michigan for a question.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I did not want the gentleman to yield so much to ask a question as for the purpose of giving the gentleman from Georgia and the House the basis for the statement which I made in answer to the question which the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] asked me.

I have here a bulletin of the Civil Service Commission issued in January 1932 and in which is this very definite statement:

> The Commission does not certify eligibles from any State in excess so long as eligibles are available from States in arrears under the apportionment except that those who are allowed preferences because of military service are certified without regard to the apportionment.

This is the basis for the statement, the correctness of which the gentleman from Georgia was inclined to question.

Mr. COX. Of course, the gentleman realizes that the Civil Service Commission knows in advance when occasions will arise for the putting of more people on the rolls.

Mr. MAPES. I do not know that. I have no information about it.

Mr. COX. At the same time they also know in what particular class certain States under the quota have nobody on the eligible list; and in order that they may continue to show favoritism, as has been the case throughout the years, they do not take steps to hold Civil Service examinations, and when the necessity comes for filling the places they name persons from the District of Columbia or some other State which has far exceeded its quota who happen to be on an eligible list that the Civil Service Commission has made up.

Mr. MAPES. Let me ask the gentleman from Georgia what earthly reason the members of the Civil Service Commission have for preferring people in the District of Columbia or Virginia or Maryland over those from other States?

Mr. JEFFERS. That is what we want to find out. We want to investigate the handling of these matters, and want things changed so as to give these underquota States some of these places here in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MAPES. It tries to do so.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky to ask a question.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Since it now appears beyond question that there can be no partisanship applied by the Civil Service Commission, may I call attention to a situation in my own State, and ask how in the city of Louisville, under a Republican administration, with a Republican mayor last year, the registration books of that city showed that with 800 policemen on the police force 799 of them were registered as Republicans and 1 of them was registered as a Democrat. I wish to know how under a system where you cannot play politics something like that happens. [Applause.] I want to know how that one single Democrat got there.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFERS. I yield for a question.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. To be so credulous as to accept without question a statement made by a party to be investigated as being full, complete, and altogether satisfying may be virtue which I do not possess and fail to appreciate. However, even the distinguished gentleman from Michigan has not always exhibited that degree of credulity in reference to other matters where like questions have arisen. He bases his objection to this resolution solely on the ground that what the Commission has reported to him is absolutely correct and complete and insists it contains all the information any Member of the House should want or should desire. Please remember this statement is submitted by the Commission which is to be investigated and is responsive only to such questions as the gentleman from Michigan asked. I assume that if the pending resolution passes, the Civil Service legislative committee will broaden the field of inquiry, and will no doubt elicit much information not called for by the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JEFFERS. I yield.

Mr. GREEN. Any adverse criticism aimed at the Civil Service Commission, or any unfavorable criticism of it, has been brought about by the other party. They are absolutely responsible for it. During the past 12 years the Civil Service has been used as a medium to absolutely load the Government in every department with Republicans, and you know it. [Applause.] They do not want to have us get the information that we need in order that those States that do not have their quota may get it. I hope this resolution will be passed.

Mr. Speaker, I now move the previous question on my amendment.

Mr. JEFFERS. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the amendment.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, is it possible to secure recognition in opposition to the amendment?

The SPEAKER. No; not now.

The question is on ordering the previous question on the amendment.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been ordered on the amendment.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman from Georgia opened up the rule for amendment, and the gentleman from Alabama offered an amendment. I claim that other amendments are in order if one amendment is in order.

The SPEAKER. The previous question has been ordered on the amendment.

Mr. SNELL. It was ordered on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama, but the previous question has not been ordered on the rule.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman in charge of the resolution [Mr. Cox] is in control of the floor; that he can yield to those to whom he wants to yield; and that no one else has any right to offer an amendment unless he yields to him.

Mr. SNELL. When the gentleman yields for an amendment he yields the floor.

Mr. BLANTON. No.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I wish an answer to my question why the gentleman from Wisconsin cannot offer an amendment so long as the resolution has been opened up to amendment.

The SPEAKER. If the Chair recognizes him, he can do it.

Mr. COX and Mr. BOILEAU rose.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox].

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I move the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I understood the Speaker to say that he would recognize the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU].

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not say that the Chair would recognize the gentleman from Wisconsin. The Chair said that if the gentleman from Wisconsin were recognized, he would be entitled to offer an amendment.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, one further question, and I am perfectly honest about this. If I understand the parliamentary situation, when a resolution of this kind is opened up for amendment, the gentleman in charge of the resolution loses control and another Member may offer another amendment. Is this correct or not?

The SPEAKER. If recognized; yes.

Mr. SNELL. If recognized? I do not think that answers the question, with all due respect to the Speaker.

Mr. BLANTON. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Georgia and the gentleman from Georgia moved the previous question.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order——

Mr. BLANTON. I call for the regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MAPES. A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SNELL. The gentleman need not get excited over this. We are going to take a little time on it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, with all due respect to our good friend, the distinguished minority leader, who I recognize has a perfect right to fight for these things, he is fighting a losing game; and I ask for the regular order, which is on the motion for the previous question.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I raised the point of order, and did not yield to the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. SNELL. The point of order which I tried to make, and which I thought the Chair sustained, was that when the gentleman in charge of the resolution opened it up for amendment the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. BOILEAU] had the right to offer a further amendment.

The SPEAKER. If recognized; yes.

Mr. BLANTON. But he has not been recognized.

Mr. SNELL. I understood the Chair to say he would recognize the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. No.

Mr. SNELL. That is mighty poor procedure.

Mr. BLANTON. Regular order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a further point of order. Upon the introduction of the resolution the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. COX] was entitled to 1 hour, and one half of that time he yielded to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY], and that 30 minutes of time has not yet expired.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, let me make this explanation: I went over to the other side and consulted, not with the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANSLEY], but with another member of the committee who was sitting by, and asked if they desired more time, because I wanted to move the previous question on the resolution, and I was informed it would be satisfactory for me to move the previous question.

Mr. BLANTON. And the previous question has been moved. and I ask for the regular order.

Mr. TABER. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that a quorum is not present.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, we can get a quorum here.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count.

Mr. BLANTON (interrupting the count). Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that they cannot break a quorum here by the Republicans now leaving the Chamber.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, at least half a dozen Republicans have just walked out of the door, and I want the RECORD to show that.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will commence the count on that side.

Mr. SNELL. The Republicans have not enough Members in this House to even break a quorum. [Laughter.]

Mr. BYRNS. I want the RECORD to show that the Republicans are deliberately trying to break a quorum while the House is endeavoring to pass this resolution.

Mr. SNELL. Oh, that is not the case at all.

Mr. BYRNS. There were at least half a dozen Republicans who went out of the door there just a few minutes ago.

Mr. SNELL. The Chair can count a dozen of them.

Mr. BLANTON. The Chair should also count the Members who are in the gallery.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, I make a point of order against any suggestions to the Chair during the count.

The SPEAKER (after counting). One hundred and forty-eight Members are present, not a quorum.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move a call of the House.

A call of the House was ordered.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry. Is this a call of the House or is it an automatic vote on ordering the previous question?

The SPEAKER. This is not an automatic vote on ordering the previous question.

The Clerk called the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Mr. HENNEY. Mr. Speaker, my colleague, Mr. HUGHES, is unavoidably detained on account of important business.

The SPEAKER. Three hundred and twenty-one Members have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I move to dispense with further proceedings under the call.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is on ordering the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on the adoption of the resolution.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. SNELL) there were—54 noes, 177 ayes.

So the resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. COX, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

INVESTIGATION OF CIVIL SERVICE COMMISSION—EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. HASTINGS. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD.

There was no objection.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, the people of the entire country are intensely interested in this resolution which I have introduced providing for an investigation by the Civil Service Committee of the House to determine whether the Civil Service law of January 16, 1883, has been enforced, and if not why it has not been enforced. The people are not going to be satisfied until each State has its fair quota of Federal employees in the District of Columbia.

The third paragraph of section 2 of the act of Congress of January 16, 1883, being "An act to regulate and improve the Civil Service of the United States", is as follows:

> Third, appointments to the public service aforesaid in the departments at Washington shall be apportioned among the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia upon the basis of population as ascertained at the last preceding census.

The records disclose that there are approximately 33,000 Federal employees in the District of Columbia and that the 4 States of Virginia, Maryland, Iowa, and Vermont, and the District of Columbia, have 16,033 employees, approximately 50 percent of the entire number when they are only entitled to 2,005. In other words they had an excess of appointments, over and above their quota, in the very face of the above statute, of 14,026. The States of Delaware and New Hampshire have their exact quotas, and all the other States have less than their quotas.

I am inserting a table showing the quota to which each State is entitled:

Figures based on United States Civil Service Commission's late report on condition of the apportionment, 1933

I was surprised at the opposition on the Republican side of the House to the passage of this resolution. I cannot see how anyone can justify opposition to this investigation. Surely no Member will want to say in the House or to the people of his own State that his constituents are not competent or worthy to serve the Federal Government. Opposition was voiced by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] who seemed to be anxious to bear the brunt of the fight.

According to the above table Michigan is entitled to 1,317 appointments, has received 442, or only 33 percent, and is in arrears 875 appointments. Will the gentleman from Michigan, or any other Member of the House be bold enough to say that out of the splendid citizenship of that State, so ably represented throughout the years both in the House and Senate, that competent men and women cannot be found in Michigan to fill the State's quota. I am sure no Member would give voice to such a suggestion within his own district.

Let us take the great State of Texas for example: It is entitled to 1,584 appointments, has received 433, or only 27 percent, and is in arrears 1,151 appointments. With all the splendid men and women who make up the citizenship of that State, will anyone rise and say that Texas should not have full opportunity to fill its quota of Federal employees.

My own State of Oklahoma is entitled to 651 appointments, has received 196, or only 30 percent of its quota, and is in arrears 455 appointments. The people of Oklahoma, men and women, are urging their delegation, both in the House and Senate, to see that they are fairly dealt with, and I am determined, insofar as I am concerned, to press this matter until the act of January 16, 1883, is complied with.

I direct the attention of every Member of the House to the above table and to the quota to which each State is entitled and has received, and ask them to answer by their vote whether they are willing to allow 3 or 4 States surrounding the District of Columbia to have one half of the employees of the Government in the very face of the mandatory statute of January 16, 1883.

I know some will say it is impossible to get the exact quota for each State. If not, it should be approximated. I feel absolutely sure, aside from a few extremely technical positions, that every State in the Union could furnish splendid men and women to fill its quota at least to 99½ percent. Now, we are going to know the reason why this statute is not enforced, and we are going to insist that as to future appointments under the Civil Service that no more appointments will be made from those States which now have more than their quotas until the States having less than their quotas are recognized.

The Civil Service Committee of the House is one of the outstanding committees, and it has an able chairman in the person of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. JEFFERS], and I am sure that under his leadership that the committee will call before it the members of the Civil Service Commission and its subordinate officials and not be satisfied until all the facts are disclosed. The committee is also authorized to call before it the heads of the various departments and bureaus to ascertain whether or not lists of eligibles who are residents of the States which have not received their full quotas of Federal employees have been regularly furnished by the Commission from which appointments could be made.

The Membership of the House has great confidence in the Civil Service Committee and confidently expect that all facts will be developed and that a report will be made to the House at an early date which will disclose why the Civil Service Act of January 16, 1883, has not been complied with, and if additional legislation is necessary for the enforcement of that act, that recommendations for such legislation will be embodied in the report of the committee.

Let me repeat that in the face of the Civil Service Act of January 16, 1883, I cannot follow the reasoning of any Member of the House in opposing the resolution to make this investigation. If there is any reason why the law cannot be complied with, as was indicated by the gentleman from Michigan, it should be reported to the House. However, I know, as every other Member of the House knows, that the law has not been complied with and that there has really been no serious effort to comply with it. There was more partisanship disclosed in connection with the consideration of this resolution than with any other during the present session of Congress. The point of no quorum was made in the hope that the House would adjourn without action, and when the Speaker began counting the number of those present a large number of Republicans absented themselves from the floor in order that it would be disclosed that no quorum was present. I submit that no one can satisfactorily explain this opposition. It may be that our friends on the other side fear an investigation of the partisan Executive orders issued in the past 12 years covering so many partisans into the Civil Service. They should all be revoked.

I have no feeling about the matter except that I want to see fairness and justness done and the Members of the House will not be satisfied without a full, fair, and complete investigation, and then not until the Civil Service Commission, and the heads of the various departments and bureaus, comply with the provisions of the Civil Service Act of January 16, 1883, to the end that each State shall receive its quota of Federal employees in the District of Columbia, as provided by that act.

The House placed a provision in the independent offices appropriation bill, 1934, as follows:

In making reductions of personnel due regard shall be given to the apportionment of appointments as provided in the Civil Service Act.

This raised a storm of opposition. The Washington newspapers discussed it at length from day to day. Attempts were made to amend, weaken, or destroy it.

Let us examine the provision a little more closely. If the act of January 16, 1883, requires that each State shall have its fair quota of Federal employees according to population, and if a large number of the States do not have their quota, then where is an injustice done any State, when Federal employees are about to be dismissed, to have them dismissed first from the overquota States. There is absolutely no argument against it. It is urged by some that efficiency should be considered, but in answer to that statement, efficient men and women can be found to fill every place in the Government service, except perhaps in a very few technical positions. Everybody admits that. Then, again, if we must fill the positions in accordance with the act of January 16, 1883, in proportion to population, why not take into consideration the quota each State has received in making the reduction of Federal employees? It is perfectly absurd to say that we cannot find efficient men and women from each State with which to fill their quotas.

MEMORIAL DAY—EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by printing in the RECORD a speech by the Honorable WILLIAM M. COLMER, a Memorial Day address delivered at Charles Town, W.Va.

There was no objection.

Mr. MONAGHAN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following Memorial Day address delivered by my colleague, Hon. WILLIAM M. COLMER, at Charles Town, W.Va., May 30, 1933:

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, permit me first to assure you of my very keen appreciation of the honor you have bestowed upon me by inviting me to participate with you in the observance of this Memorial Day. I am not unmindful of this honor any more than I am aware of the unfortunate fact that due to the stress and the demands made upon one's time incident to the gigantic legislative program which is being rushed through the American Congress, I have been unable to give the time and attention to the preparation that your courtesy and the occasion justify.

On this, the occasion of my first having set foot upon historic West Virginia ground, I wish that time would permit my giving expression in some detail to my deep appreciation of the wealth of the history of this great Commonwealth and the substantial contribution that your magnificent State has and is making to the construction and maintenance of this great Republic. The wealth of your natural resources, coupled with your industrial accomplishments, are exceeded only by the fine and genial quality of your enlightened citizenship. On my short trip traversing that portion of your State through which I have this day traveled, I have been impressed profoundly with these facts. And may I not digress here, in expressing my appreciation of your uniform courtesy and hospitality, to congratulate you upon that outstanding, fine specimen of young manhood whom this district has honored with a seat in the Halls of the American Congress, Young, affable, intelligent far above the average, genial in his nature, and possessed of oratorical ability to subdue a mob or please an audience of the most intellectual, your Representative in Congress, JENNINGS RANDOLPH, is fast attaining the position of prestige and respect to which he is so surely destined.

How fitting and appropriate that on this occasion, in every hamlet and in every urban center throughout the United States, a patriotic and grateful American people have gathered to pay their homage and respect to those of the Nation's sons who have fought their country's battles and who have now finally and eternally passed from the gory battlefields of war into the eternal solace and quiet of the fields of peace. No longer do they hear the tramp of marching feet, the thunder of murderous cannon, or witness the carnage of modern warfare. With the boundless army of the dead, they await the triumphant bugle call of Gabriel himself into a life of everlasting peace. What a colorful occasion—the boys who wore the gray mingling with and joining in the comradeship of the boys who wore the blue and the khaki; youth, maturity, old age; the flower-bedecked stand; the colorful draping of the flag; the pleasing spectacle of the Stars and Bars interwoven with the Stars and Stripes; witness the Confederate veteran, adorned in the uniform of gray, with stooped shoulders, faltering steps, and eyes dimmed with age, a uniform the sight of which once drove the enemy into hasty retreat, shoulders that once were so broad and manly, eyes that once directed a deadly fire and an accurate aim down a glistening rifle barrel, a faltering step that once proudly marched to victory against great odds. Though the shoulders be stooped, the step faltering, and the eyes be dimmed, there is in that weakened old heart as strong a love for the cause for which he fought as that which spurred him on at Chancellorsville and Gettysburg. His lines are fast diminishing. These brave heroes who brought honor to the South are falling under the fire of age and nature almost as fast as they fell under the murderous fire of the enemy in Pickett's gallant charge at Gettysburg. But a few more years will have elapsed before the last of them will have answered the last roll call. All hail these surviving heroes who so ably upheld the traditions of the South! All honor to their departed comrades who sleep the sleep of death!

It is not my purpose on this occasion to fight anew the cause of the South. Recorded history has determined that question beyond the realm of controversy. In spite of the efforts of sectional historians and partisan minds, the greatest fratricidal strife that was ever fought, when the blood of the brother of the North ran down through the same rivulet with the blood of the brother of the South, was not fought on the question of slavery. Its basis was more fundamental, its grounds more justified. The question purely and simply was: Did a sovereign State have the right to secede from the Union? The South maintained that it did—the North successfully opposed, by arms, that view. This inherent right, provided for by the Articles of Confederation and the Constitution itself, could not successfully be denied. It could only be overthrown by expediency. That right was maintained by the New England States long prior to the Civil War. It was jealously guarded by those States south of the line created by Messrs. Mason and Dixon. The cause of the South was as morally and legally right as was the expediency and fortunate culmination of the position maintained by the North.

We are told that the cause of the South is a lost cause. But can it be successfully maintained that any cause is a lost cause, the justice and the morality of which is right? But, approximately 70 years have elapsed in the space of time since that unfortunate strife was fought. That it was best that the Union should have prevailed is now as indisputable as was then the justice of the cause of the South. I shudder to think of what might have happened had the South prevailed. Unquestionably, other States, even of the Confederacy, would soon have maintained their right to secede because of some real or imaginary cause, and in the end might we not have had 48 separate and sovereign nations; or, worse still, weakened by the lack of union, might we not have soon fallen prey to some aggressive and unscrupulous foreign foe? In the memories of that deadly strife when our Southland was handicapped and overshadowed in money, men, and the other sinews of war, there is enough glamor and honor and justice to the valor of the South as there is fortune and wisdom in the happy culmination of the war.

But, any discussion of that tragic period between 1860 and 1865 of this Nation's history could not be considered complete without some reference and tribute to that great leader of the cause of the Confederacy and citizen of my own State, the indomitable, courageous, genteel leader from Mississippi, the first and only president of the Confederacy, Jefferson Davis. No cause ever had a more courageous and able leader than did the South in Jefferson Davis. No nation records in its history the parallel of one of its sons being more unjustly accused and maligned than in the case of this southern gentleman and American patriot.

It is easy to conceive how a military leader like Lee could be hailed even by his enemies as a great general. It has ever been the custom of a people to pay their homage and respect to their soldiers. There is, and always will be, a certain glamor about those who lead their men on the field of battle. It is equally difficult to justify the attitude taken by even a biased section in the futile effort that has been made to draw a distinction between the civil leader and the father of the Confederacy—on the one hand, Jefferson Davis, and on the other, that outstanding general of all times, Robert E. Lee. Jefferson Davis never advocated a principle in the cause of the South or promulgated an order for the effectuation of that principle that the idol of the South and the commander of the southern armies, General Lee, did not whole-heartedly approve and endeavor to carry out in blood, if necessary. There attaches to the one the glamor and the color of a great military career, hailed by all the world as comparable with that of Napoleon and Washington. In the unpartisan minds of those who think, and in the hearts of the southern citizenship, there is a love and devotion to the memory of the civil leader, Jefferson Davis, that comes only from the knowledge and the memory of a truly great man. Within my own congressional district and within a 15-minute drive of my own home, there nestles upon the shore of the Mexican Gulf kissed coast that historic shrine to which all true southerners turn their eyes and their steps to pay respect and homage to this magnificent specimen of American manhood—Beauvoir—that stately old southern home, nestled amid the oaks and the pines, where Jefferson Davis spent his last days in peace and quiet.

Almost daily it is my privilege and my pleasure to gaze upon the statue of Jefferson Davis in the Hall of Fame of the Nation's Capitol where it rightfully belongs with the other truly great Americans like Washington, Lincoln, and Lee. History in the future, written by an unbiased hand, will place this man's name in the everlasting memory of those who appreciate the great. A few weeks ago there was a whisper of a suggestion that due to the tremendous weight of the statues of America's noted men the floor of the Capitol was weakening and that it might be necessary to remove approximately half of these statutes of our heroes. It was rumored that the statue of Davis might be one of those. Immediately there was a substantial and vigorous protest filed to the effect the statue of Jefferson Davis must not be removed from the Nation's Hall of Fame. But, after all, there is no need for a statue of bronze or marble erected to this much maligned and abused and misunderstood man of the South. He already has and always will have in the hearts of the true southerners a monument with which no monument of bronze or stone can compare. If every southerner who loved the name of Jefferson Davis should but bring a pebble to this spot today and pile them in order, there would be a monument erected that would pierce the ethereal blue of these southern skies. If I am appreciative of the significance of this occasion, I fear that I have already given too much space in the allotted time to the memory and the cause of the South. Those were the stirring days about which the poets love to sing and the artists like to paint. But those tragic days are but history. Thank God the Union was saved.

The scene must be shifted in the progress of the Nation, for in 1917 and 1918 America contributed in a substantial manner to the winning of another strife. When the Germans were hammering at the gates of Paris, America's pride—the flower of its young manhood—was called upon to go across 3,000 miles of trackless ocean, infested with deadly submarines, there to fight a foreign enemy upon a foreign soil. Need I remind you that it was the American soldier who, when it appeared that the sun of civilization was about to set and it looked as though 2,000 years of Christianity had been in vain, at the battles of the Argonne and Chateau-Thierry turned back the invading Germans and saved for posterity the wealth of civilization accumulated throughout the Christian era.

Sometimes when legislation is being enacted in the present strife I wonder if, after all, we are as appreciative and grateful as we should be to those heroes who so valiantly fought the Nation's battles in the recent World War. And may I not digress to state in passing that the apparent injustices which are threatening to result from certain legislation to our veterans will be righted in the very near future. I say this as one who in this great crisis of the Nation has steadfastly and consistently, as a Member of Congress, supported the President, the Commander in Chief, in his war against the depression. With a love for the cause of the veterans of all wars, surpassed only by the love and devotion which I harbor for my own immediate family, I have reason to believe after having discussed these matters with him. who himself is a disabled American veteran of the World War, the present occupant of the White House, that he has a heart as full of gratitude and sympathetic understanding as it is of courage and devotion to country, and he will take—nay, he is taking—steps, with the power that was entrusted to him by Congress, to right these wrongs before they are inflicted.

It was my privilege some 5 years ago to make a pilgrimage along with some 20,000 other legionnaires to France to attend an American Legion convention in Paris. On that trip I had occasion to visit an American cemetery at Chateau-Thierry. I shall never forget the scene I witnessed there. There on the sloping hillside of that famous battle ground I saw row after row of tiny white crosses glistening against a green background in the morning sunlight, marking the last resting place of many a devoted American mother's son. I saw an American mother who, too, had made the pilgrimage over there to this international shrine to locate and view for the only time in her life that sacred plot of earth which entombed all that was sacred and dear to her. I saw her garbed in her simple black gown as she walked between the rows of crosses seeking the legend that marked the spot of him she had given in the cause of God and country. Her step was faltering, her eyes were dimmed with tears and with age. I saw that tiny, feeble, white hand as it rested upon that tiny white cross, and with hot tears of sorrow and pride dropping in christening drops upon the poppies and grass that there grew. I stood in awe and respectful silence and wondered what must be the thoughts that welled up within her. I thought if she must not be wondering how that boy's precious blood must have colored the stream of civilization as it ran in tiny rivulets into the stream of death. America must not, America will not forget the debt of gratitude that she owes to the memory of those who died that we might live and those who fought that we might prosper in that great strife.

But we are discussing our yesterdays. Today this reunited country, reunited from the Gulf of Mexico, which borders my own native State on the south, to the Lakes, which separate us from our neighbors on the north, is engaged in another war—a peaceful but deadly economic war against the threat of a collapse of our economic structure. In my opinion, and I say this advisedly, this country today faces the greatest crisis it has ever faced in its history. It is not overshadowed by the doubtful days of the Revolution, the tragic days of the Civil War, or the threat of destruction of civilization of the World War. A brave fight is being waged by a reunited, patriotic American people. It is true that no foreign foe threatens to invade our sacred soil. The dove of peace appears to flit tranquilly about the Nation's horizon, but the potentialities of another great internal strife are seething beneath the surface. As a result of the great world-wide war, the whole economic structure of the world has been upset. Trade relations have almost ceased between the nations of the world. The wheels of industry have become corroded with idleness. People have become despondent, and until recently, with the advent of that superb and courageous leader, Franklin D. Roosevelt, into the White House, there was almost a collapse of confidence in our Government and our Government officials. Legislation having for its purpose the relief of the distressed, the employment of the idle, and above all the restoration of confidence is being enacted by your National Congress. There must be, I know there will be, a revival of business and a restoration of confidence among our sorely distressed people as a result of this indomitable leadership and this remedial legislation.

But, may I not remind my patriotic hearers who have evidenced their patriotism and their love of country by their presence here on this occasion that legislation and leadership, however wise and courageous, alone will not restore prosperity and confidence and America to its just place in world affairs? The unprecedented and unnatural prosperity which followed in the wake of the World War has, to a great extent, brought with it attendant sordid lust for gain and material things. It was not prosperity of this sort that made this country truly great, for—

"Ill fares the land, to hast'ning ills a prey, Where wealth accumulates and men decay."

It was rather the intelligence, patriotism, and the Christian fortitude of our forefathers that gave America its enviable position in the sun of world affairs. So, hand in hand, with the courageous and intelligent leadership of the great Franklin D. Roosevelt must come an old-fashioned revival of American patriotism, fortitude, and Christianity. There must be a "renaissance", a rededication of those great and everlasting principles which really made America. We must forget the desire for material and sordid wealth, even as we have buried sectional jealousies and hatred. United, as one people, with these lofty principles of our forefathers to guide us in the future as they have steadied us in the past, America will survive this crisis and come out triumphant, resplendent in its glory, overcoming all obstacles in the future as it has in the past, looking to the establishment of peace throughout the world.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, at the request of the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee, I ask unanimous consent that that committee may have until 12 o'clock tonight to file a report.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. ROGERS of Oklahoma. Reserving the right to object, gentlemen on the Republican side mentioned my State in discussing the Civil Service changes, and said that the people from Oklahoma and some other States had not been able to qualify and did not want the jobs. I do not want the RECORD to show that. I am willing that the statement should stand that they were not able to qualify, but I do not want the RECORD to show that they did not want the jobs. [Laughter.]

Mr. TINKHAM. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, before that consent is granted, I desire to ask that I may address the House tomorrow morning for 20 minutes.

Mr. O'BRIEN. I object.

Mr. KENNEY. I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce have until midnight tonight to file a report upon the railroad bill?

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, let me say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN], if he will reserve his objection, that his objection to the filing of this report between now and 12 o'clock tonight means that this bill cannot be taken up tomorrow, and that this House will be absolutely without any business to do tomorrow. If the gentleman wants to go before the country with the responsibility that this House loiters tomorrow because it has no business, of course, that is his privilege, but when everybody here is desirous of adjourning and getting away, when the country is anxious to have the Congress adjourn, I do hope that there will be no objection. If objection is made, it will take two or three times longer than otherwise would be taken. I hope the gentleman will be reasonable about the matter and permit us to file the report between now and 12 o'clock tonight.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, to a certain extent I think the statement made by the gentleman from Tennessee is correct. Of course, there has been a little misunderstanding here. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] asked for 15 or 20 minutes yesterday, and I think he ought to have been granted that time. I think perhaps we can make some arrangement whereby the gentleman can file his report and the gentleman from Massachusetts can get 15 minutes in which to address the House.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, further reserving the right to object, may I say this to the gentleman from Tennessee. About the only right left to a Republican in this House is to speak on the floor of the House. We have not any right very often, even to discuss or offer amendments to legislation. I think a gentleman who has served 20 years in the House, who wants to talk on foreign affairs, who is a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, should have the right to do so. It is the only right left to the opposition in the House.

Mr. BYRNS. That is not involved in the matter before the House now. That matter can come up and be considered. The question is on the request that I make that the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce have until midnight tonight to file a report, a usual request, and one that I never heard denied before.

Mr. FISH. It is a proper request, but so is the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts a proper request.

Mr. BYRNS. Let me say to the House that we have a rule here which makes it possible to take up this bill tomorrow. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. McFADDEN] wishes to take the position that we shall take the bill up without printing, then, if this side of the House will agree, we will take it up anyway. [Applause on the Democratic side.] There is no sense in objecting to it.

Mr. FISH. We are not trying to get into any row, but we are trying to get the right of one Member to speak.

Mr. BYRNS. I do not object to the gentleman from Massachusetts speaking. I have declared my willingness and have urged gentlemen on this side not to object, but I cannot control that.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] has been a Member of this House for 19 years. On many questions he and I have vitally disagreed; but I believe that he should be accorded the privilege of speaking here, regardless of whether or not we like his speech. This is his public forum. This House is the public forum of every Member in it. There would be no such thing left as free speech if we seek to censor a Member's speech before he makes it. I sincerely hope that it will be arranged for the gentleman from Massachusetts to have 15 minutes as soon as the House meets tomorrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I serve notice that we have a rule, an open rule, which will come up tomorrow at 12 o'clock, and while we may not have the printed bill, I hope that the majority of the House will agree to go on with the rule and discuss the bill tomorrow.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman be willing under general discussion of the bill to give the gentleman from Massachusetts 20 minutes? [Cries of "No!" on Democratic side.]

Mr. BYRNS. I am not going to be driven into this matter by tactics which have been shown here this afternoon by one gentleman on the Republican side. I had an agreement with the gentleman from Massachusetts and with the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] that he should have time at the conclusion of those rules, and one single objection on the Republican side increased by an hour's time consideration of the first rule presented.

If that objection had not been made it could have been disposed of in 5 minutes.

Mr. McFADDEN. Mr. Speaker, in view of the statement just made, I want to remind the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] and the Members of the House, of the colloquy that took place between us two gentlemen this morning when I asked him to yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts, and to ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] should be permitted to speak, and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] himself refused to do that.

Mr. BYRNS. I am not going to ask unanimous consent for any gentleman upon that side to take 15 or 20 minutes to discuss the subject which I understand is in the mind of the gentleman.

Mr. McFADDEN. That proves the statement that the gentleman did not intend to carry out his agreement.

Mr. BYRNS. That is not true, and the gentleman knows it. The gentleman undertook to interfere in an agreement in which he had no part and with which he is not concerned, and if the gentleman had kept out of the proposition this morning, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] would have finished his speech and we would all have been home by this time. [Applause.]

Mr. McFADDEN. I will say to the gentleman——

Regular order was demanded.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow morning.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Reserving the right to object——

The SPEAKER. Is there objection.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes. I object.

Mr. POPE and Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas each submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by them, respectively, to House bill 5755, the so-called "industrial-control and public-works bill", which were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALSH. I ask that a number of amendments intended to be proposed by me to title I of House bill 5755, the national industrial recovery bill, with an explanation of the amendments, be printed, printed in the RECORD, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, that order will be made.

The amendments and explanation are as follows:

AMENDMENTS INTENDED TO BE PROPOSED BY MR. WALSH TO TITLE I OF NATIONAL INDUSTRIAL RECOVERY BILL, H.R. 5755

Amendments suggested to reconcile discrepancies, correct omissions, and clarify certain provisions

AMENDMENT NO. 1

Page 8, line 3, after the word "joining", insert a comma, followed by the following words: "organizing or assisting."

EXPLANATION OF AMENDMENT NO. 1

The major purpose of this bill is to restore employment and maintain purchasing power. The most important safeguard for the maintenance of purchasing power is the preservation of labor's right of collective bargaining. Section 7 (a) has been properly inserted for the provision of this safeguard.

The right of collective bargaining cannot be assured without the abolition of "yellow dog" contracts, and subsection (2) of section 7 (a) is addressed to this aim. "Yellow dog" contracts not only prohibit employees from joining labor organizations but often prohibit them from organizing their fellow employees and prohibit them from doing anything which might tend to lend assistance to any labor organization. Subsection (2) should therefore be amplified to include agreements which compel employees to refrain from organizing or assisting labor organizations.

AMENDMENT NO. 2

Page 8, line 13, strike out the word "working", and after the word "conditions" strike out the comma and insert the words "of employment." Line 21, strike out the word "working", and on line 22, after the word "conditions", insert the words "of employment." Page 9, line 3, strike out the word "working", and after the word "conditions" insert the words "of employment."

EXPLANATION OF AMENDMENT NO. 2

On page 8 the expression "working conditions" is used four times. "Working conditions" might be construed as limited to physical conditions within a factory. "Conditions of employment" is a much broader phrase and might include the problem of night labor by women and children and other employment restrictions as well as the physical condition of the factory.

AMENDMENT NO. 3

Page 4, strike out lines 12 to 14.

Page 6, strike out the portion of line 8 after the word "law" and strike out lines 9 to 14, inclusive.

Page 10, strike out the portion of line 5 after the word "competition" and strike out all of lines 6 and 7.

Page 10, after line 12, insert a new section, to be numbered 10, reading as follows:

"SEC. 10. Any person who violates any provision of this title, or who violates any provision of any code of fair competition approved under this title, or who violates any agreement entered into or approved under this title, or who carries on any business without a license required under this title or after such license shall have been canceled, or who violates the conditions of any license, or who violates any rule or regulation prescribed under this title, shall be fined not more than $500 or imprisoned not more than 6 months, or both, and each day any such violation continues shall be deemed a separate offense."

EXPLANATION OF AMENDMENT NO. 3

Sections 3 (b), 4 (b), and 9 (a) provide varying forms of penalties, while section 4 (a) does not provide any penalty for the violation of an agreement.

It is suggested that all penalties be made uniform and that they cover violations of agreements as well as all codes, licenses, rules, and regulations.

AMENDMENT NO. 4

Page 4, strike out lines 15 to 21, inclusive, and on line 21 change "(d)" to "(c)".

Page 10, insert a new section, to be numbered 11, as follows:

"SEC. 11. The several district courts of the United States are hereby invested with jurisdiction to prevent and restrain violations of the provisions of this title, and violations of any code of fair competition approved under this title, and violations of any agreement entered into or approved under this title, and the carrying on of any business without a license required under this title or after a cancelation of any such license, and violations of the conditions of any license, and violations of any rule or regulation prescribed under this title; and it shall be the duty of the several district attorneys of the United States, in their respective districts, under the direction of the Attorney General, to institute proceedings in equity to prevent and restrain such violations."

EXPLANATION OF AMENDMENT NO. 4

Section 3 (c) provides for injunctive relief for violation of a code, but no injunctive relief is provided for other violations. It is suggested that injunctive relief apply to all violations.

AMENDMENT NO. 5

Page 6, strike out all of lines 4 and 5 and the first four words of line 6, concluding with the word "thereof."

Page 10, line 8, after the word "cancel", insert a comma, followed by the words "revoke, suspend."

EXPLANATION OF AMENDMENT NO. 5

Page 6, lines 4 to 6 authorize the President to suspend or revoke any license after notice and hearing. This contradicts section 9 (b), on page 10, which authorizes the President to cancel or modify any license. It seems as though the latter provision of section 9 (b) supersedes the former provision on page 6, which is part of section 4 (b).

AMENDMENT NO. 6

Page 6, strike out the last five words of line 6 beginning with "any", all of line 7, and the first three words of line 8, concluding with "law."

Page 10, line 10, after the word "title", strike out the semicolon and insert a comma followed by the following words: ", and any such action of the President as well as any other action of the President pursuant to this title shall be final."

EXPLANATION OF AMENDMENT NO. 6

On page 6, the second half of line 6, all of line 7, and the first three words of line 8 provide that an order of the President revoking a license shall be final. This might be more properly inserted in section 9 (b) to cover all acts of the President.

AMENDMENT NO. 7

Page 10, line 5, after the word "competition", strike out the comma and insert the words "and agreements."

EXPLANATION OF AMENDMENT NO. 7

Section 9 (a) authorizes the President to prescribe fees for licenses and for filing codes of fair competition. He should also be authorized to prescribe fees for filing voluntary agreements under section 4 (a).

AMENDMENT NO. 8

Page 9, strike out line 14 and insert the following: "any individual, firm, partnership, company, association, joint-stock association, trust and corporation, and any assignee for the benefit of creditors, committee, receiver, or trustee operating any business, and every other person, natural or artificial, engaged in commerce."

EXPLANATION OF AMENDMENT NO. 8

Section 7 (d) defines the word "person." This definition might be amplified.

ALLOCATION OF HIGHWAY FUNDS UNDER PUBLIC WORKS BILL

Mr. WALSH. I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter addressed to me from A. W. Brandt, State Highway Commissioner of New York. This letter is relative to the allocation of highway funds under section 204 of the public works bill. It contains a tabulation showing the amount that will be allotted to each of the States under the different methods of allocation. It favors the provisions contained in the House bill dealing with this subject.

I ask that the letter and table may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance.

There being no objection, the letter and table were ordered to be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Finance, as follows:

WASHINGTON, D.C., May 29, 1933.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: I am attaching hereto a copy of a letter written to Senator HARRISON, Chairman of the Senate Finance Committee, of which you are also a member, relative to the allocation of highway funds under section 204 of the public works bill. I am also attaching a copy of the tabulation showing the amount of money per capita by States under this $400,000,000 allocation, the amount per gainful worker, and the amount per unemployed worker, if the money is allocated under the Federal Highway Act only. Column 4 shows the amount per unemployed worker by States in case the money is allotted—three quarters on the basis of the Federal Highway Act, and one quarter on the basis of population.

Inasmuch as your State is one of those that will lose heavily in case the allocation in the fourth column as passed by the House is not followed, I am sure you will resist all efforts in the Finance Committee to change the allocation.

Very truly yours,

A. W. BRANDT,
State Highway Commissioner, New York State.

P.S.—The loss to your State in case the three-fourths, one-fourth allocation is not maintained will be $2,037,300.

MAY 29, 1933.

Hon. PAT HARRISON,
United States Senate.

MY DEAR SENATOR HARRISON: The House when it passed the public works bill provided that the $400,000,000 authorized under section 204 should be allocated to the States, three fourths on the basis of the Federal Highway Act and one fourth on the basis of population. This method of allocation was endorsed by a subcommittee representing the executive committee of the American Association of State Highway Officials. It was accepted by the President and included in the bill transmitted to Congress. Copies of this bill were sent to all State highway officials, and not one protest against the method of allocation has been received.

The American Association of State Highway Officials realizes that this is not in the strict sense of the word a public works bill, but is an emergency relief measure, and that more consideration than the Federal Highway Act provides should be given to the unemployed in each State.

I am attaching hereto several copies of a tabulation showing the amount per capita by States that this $400,000,000 provides as well as the amount per gainful worker and the amount per unemployed worker under the provisions of the Federal Highway Act. You will notice that the State of Massachusetts receives $7.69 for each unemployed worker under the provisions of the Federal Highway Act, while the State of Nevada receives $362.24 for each unemployed worker, nearly fifty times as much. Certainly there is nothing equitable in the way of relief in any such allocation as that. The fourth column of this tabulation shows the amount that each unemployed worker receives on the basis of three fourths of the money allocation under the Federal Highway Act and one fourth on the basis of population. That is by no means an equitable distribution; that is, the State of Massachusetts will only receive $10.42 per unemployed worker, while the State of Nevada receives $276.80 per unemployed worker.

As a member of the committee representing the State highway officials, I urge that your committee oppose any effort to change the allocation in the bill as passed by the House. I am sure by looking over this tabulation the members of your committee will agree that the sparsely settled States are being treated more than fairly, and that if there is any just grievance it is in the States which are densely populated, where the intensity of unemployment is the greatest.

I am also attaching hereto a chart showing the intensity of unemployment in each State.

Very truly yours,

A. W. BRANDT,
For the Committee Representing American Association of State Highway Officials.

PAYMENTS FROM THE TREASURY UNDER THE SETTLEMENT OF WAR CLAIMS ACT

Mr. COPELAND submitted the following resolution (S.Res. 91), which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

Whereas Germany has exercised certain of the rights conferred by the agreement of June 23, 1930, between the United States and Germany permitting the suspension of payments by Germany of the sums payable under that agreement on account of awards of the Mixed Claims Commission, and no such payments have been made under the agreement since March 31, 1931, and suspensions of payments by Germany under the terms of that agreement without the consent of the United States are permitted for a period not exceeding 2½ years from the date of suspension of payment; and

Whereas the Treaty of Berlin of August 25, 1921, provided that "all property of the Imperial German Government, * * * and of all German nationals, which was, on April 6, 1917, in or has since that date come into the possession or under the control of, or has been the subject of a demand by the United States of America or of any of its officers, agents, or employees, from any source or by any agency whatsoever, * * * shall be retained by the United States of America and no disposition thereof made, * * * until such time as the Imperial German Government * * * or their successor or successors, shall have * * * made suitable provision for the satisfaction of all claims against said Government * * * of all persons, wheresoever domiciled who owe permanent allegiance to the United States of America and who have suffered, through the acts of the Imperial German Government, or its agents, * * * loss, damage, or injury to their persons, or property, directly or indirectly"; and

Whereas the Settlement of War Claims Act of 1928 was enacted upon the understanding by the Congress that suitable provision would be made for all claims against Germany of American nationals who have suffered through acts of Germany, or its agents, loss, damage, or injury to their persons or property, in accordance with the provisions of the Treaty of Berlin, and would be paid out of the German special deposit account in the Treasury of the United States which was created by said act; and

Whereas there are on file in the Department of State unadjudicated claims against Germany of more than 3,000 American nationals who have suffered loss, damage, and injury to their persons and property, principally as a result of Germany's submarine warfare; and

Whereas the full amount of all of the principal of awards of the Mixed Claims Commission heretofore entered has already been paid by the Secretary of the Treasury under the provisions of the Settlement of War Claims Act of 1928, as well as the full amount of interest on the smaller awards of less than $100,000 and certain payments to German nationals; and there is no requirement by law for payment by the Secretary of the Treasury of further amounts under the Settlement of War Claims Act of 1928 prior to the completion of the work of the Mixed Claims Commission; and

Whereas the Secretary of the Treasury, before the Congress again convenes, before suitable provision has been made for the adjudication and payment of the claims of American nationals against Germany now on file in the Department of State, and before the German Government resumes its payments under the agreement of June 23, 1930, may make further payments out of the German special deposit fund, including payments to German nationals which will inure to the benefit of Germany: Therefore be it

Resolved, That it is the opinion of the Senate that the Secretary of the Treasury should not make further payments out of the funds in the Treasury under the Settlement of War Claims Act, or release any of the bonds of Germany now held in the Treasury of the United States pursuant to the terms of the agreement between Germany and the United States signed June 23, 1930, until suitable provision shall have been made by Germany for the adjudication and payment of all the claims of American nationals now on file in the Department of State; and, furthermore, that the Secretary of State should not consent to the discontinuance of the work of the Mixed Claims Commission until suitable provision has been made and consented to by the Government of Germany for the full ascertainment of Germany's liability to the United States under the treaty of Berlin with respect to all claims of American nationals now on file in the Department of State, and until the discontinuance of the labors of the Mixed Claims Commission shall have been approved by the Congress of the United States.

(a) In States where there is no State system of public employment offices, in establishing and maintaining a system of public employment officers under the control of the director.

(b) In States where there is a State system of public employment offices, but where the State has not complied with the provisions of section 4, in establishing a cooperative Federal and State system of public employment offices to be maintained by such officer or board and in such manner as may be agreed upon by and between the Governor of the State and the director.

Mr. WAGNER. I move that the Senate concur in the amendments of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

UNFAIR TRADE PRACTICES

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a statement by Mr. Adam Kessler, Jr., of N. W. Ayer & Son, of Philadelphia, relative to unfair trade practices.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Masses must earn before they can spend.

Masses must be employed at fair wages before they earn.

Manufacturers must see the opportunity to profitably produce before they will employ.

When masses have not buying power, trading instinct cries for lower prices. Then destructive operations start and continue until there is no profit for a manufacturer, little if any profit for wholesalers and retailers, and the result is production of inferior, misrepresented merchandise produced with underpaid labor to keep within a so-called "buyers' market."

The unscrupulous buyer grinds away and away until honest businesses are forced to close, more people are thrown out of employment, and there is no profit for the legitimate channels of trade with a continued decimation of these forces. Thus we go from bad to worse, finding ourselves in the hands of the selfish, unscrupulous manufacturers, wholesalers, and retailers—always destroying, never creating except for their few selves at the expense of the masses—and so parasite destroys parasite.

The destruction of production forces and trade channels must stop and construction must begin. Inventories are depleted—an excellent point from which to start. They will be replenished when confidence is restored through an appreciation that honest goods can be sold at an honest price, giving a living to the handlers and a value to the buyers, as well as a profit to the manufacturer. By this reaction the wholesaler benefits as do the honest factors in production, their workers, those from whom they in turn buy supplies, and in turn their workers, until we come to the labor and raw-material basis of each and every manufacturing fabrication.

Until the unscrupulous manufacturers and tradesmen are controlled they will continue their devastating practices. As President Roosevelt so ably said in his speech on Sunday night, May 7, in speaking of further legislation:

"Well-considered and conservative measures will likewise be proposed, which will attempt to give to the industrial workers of the country a more fair wage upturn, prevent cutthroat competition and unduly long hours for labor, and at the same time to encourage each industry to prevent overproduction."

He further told us:

"We cannot ballyhoo ourselves back to prosperity."

And in speaking further on the bad practices that conditions have developed, he said:

"Let me illustrate with an example. Take the cotton-goods industry. It is probably true that 90 percent of the cotton manufacturers would agree to eliminate starvation wages, would agree to stop long hours of employment, would agree to stop child labor, would agree to prevent an overproduction that would result in unsalable surpluses.

"But what good is such an agreement if the other 10 percent of cotton manufacturers pay starvation wages, require long hours, employ children in their mills, and turn out burdensome surpluses?

"The unfair 10 percent could produce goods so cheaply that the fair 90 percent would be compelled to meet the unfair conditions. Here is where government comes in. Government ought to have the right, and will have the right, after surveying and planning for an industry, to prevent, with the assistance of the overwhelming majority of that industry, unfair practice and to enforce this agreement by the authority of Government."

In speaking of the antitrust laws he said:

"* * * but these laws were never intended to encourage the kind of unfair competition that results in long hours, starvation wages, and overproduction.

"The same principle applies to farm products and to transportation and every other field of organized private industry."

Control the 10 percent or give the other 90 percent the power to control them and there will have been taken one of the fundamental steps of rehabilitation.

How?

Honest manufacturers have for years placed their names on the merchandise they have produced—that is, where it was practical to do so—and we have seen these names appear on many articles where in previous years we did not believe it practical. An honest man will not only sell his name with his goods as a mark of identification and guaranty of value but will invest, and has invested, part of his profits that people may know of same for their own protection in their safe buying of merchandise.

When a man sells his name on his merchandise, he is selling something more than a mere fabricated commodity. He is selling a part of his capital investment, the skill and livelihood of men and women he has trained in his business and who are gainfully employed.

He should be equally insured with all these people he employs, directly and indirectly, by being permitted to participate in the life and trade of this Nation, free from the ravages of the unscrupulous, destructive factors that have so imperiled the livelihood of our millions of workers.

Production cannot and must not be divorced from distribution. Correction and control must carry down to the very doorsteps of the smallest retail establishment, the community market, and the sidewalk merchant because, first, many manufacturers have fostered the cut-price movement by selling their merchandise at a differential to selected buyers, enabling this class to sell to the consumer at a price that the same manufacturer would sell the same article to many thousands of merchants who may not be classified in the group of selected buyers; second, the retailers and wholesalers falling in this latter class have been forced, in an effort to protect themselves, into forming almost every character of association. Their intentions have been good but the results not particularly beneficial.

The law says in a broad way that you cannot take another man's life by premeditation. Here we have a practice which, in the guise of benefits to the masses, is in itself insidious, vicious, torturingly destructive, and equally deadly.

Therefore, if the honest manufacturers are permitted by law to name the consumer price on their merchandise, with equal regulatory control over the channels of distribution through wholesaler and retailer, then there would be formed the first important step in correcting this great existing evil.

This does not mean that, in a given industry, and let us use for illustration here the food industry, all branches should be on the same percentage basis above a given plane, nor does it mean that every manufacturer in any one branch of this industry should be on a given percentage basis above a given plane. But it does mean that every manufacturer would have a right to set a minimum wholesale, retail, and consumer price on the product he produces and that that price would be officially registered, that he could not depart from this minimum price without proper record and consent, that anyone departing from this list of minimum prices in their particular functioning in the channel of distribution would be guilty of violation of the law, subject to confiscation of property, fine, and imprisonment.

"Minimum price" is used here rather than a definite price for the reason that we must recognize that certain variations of price within reasonable limits are fair and permissible on the basis of service and nonservice distributive organizations. However, as an illustration, the price that an article is sold for by a corner grocery store and the price the same article is sold for by a cash-and-carry store in the grocery field should be such that the minimum price so regulated would not be more than 10 percent less than the basic list price at which the corner grocery would sell, this differential not to exist however in the wholesale channels but only in the retail field. Such an arrangement would still return a fair profit to all classes of retailers in relation to turn-over and volume.

There is another factor in the channels of distribution that has contributed chaos and destruction in the retail selling field.

Chain stores in their early beginning developed in the 5-cent and 10-cent field, or what may be known as the "novelty field", then rapidly spread into groceries, tobacco, meats, etc.

In the course of this development and in the desire to corral business on an unfair basis, grocery stores expanded to include meats and green goods and candy, and have even gone so far in many cases as to sell housefurnishings.

In the drug field they have departed from drugs and the immediate allied articles of that trade until the vast majority of drug stores are unrecognizable today, having largely the semblance of lunch rooms and novelty stores.

There is correction needed in this retail scheme of distribution providing that a man in the drug business confine his selling to drugs and those things definitely allied with them, that a chain in the tobacco field should confine itself to tobacco products and those things definitely allied with them, in the grocery field the same thing, likewise in the meat field, and in the green-goods field, and so on. Likewise there should be a clear definition as to the departmentalization of department stores and that group of stores that fall into the classification known as the "5-cent, 10-cent, 25-cent, and $1 stores."

Retail-trade activities definitely prescribed and regulated along these lines, together with price control on the part of manufacturers who elect to apply same on the goods they produce, would give a method under which honest retailing would be conducted, yielding a fair living to those participating. As the situation exists today, they operate at a loss and in distress through the unfair and greedy practices of those who have been able to corral capital, take advantage of distress merchandise, and thereby operate a destructive scheme of selling.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5389) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate suspend rule XVI for the purpose of considering the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I want to take just a little time to explain my amendment. When we had the matter up yesterday I believe there were not more than 30 Senators present.

The amendment which I propose to offer, if the rule is suspended, is one that provides that service-connected veterans and pensioners shall not have their compensation reduced in excess of 15 percent. Another important provision of the amendment, as I conceive it to be, is that where a veteran is already upon the roll as a service-connected case drawing compensation or is on the roll as a pensioner, his case having once been thoroughly considered and a decision reached that he was entitled to the compensation or the pension, in any effort thereafter to review that case, the object being to bring about some reduction, the law should require that the burden of proof be upon the Government. If the Government seeks either to reduce or take away from the veteran an allowance which has previously been made to him upon the record furnished, after deliberate consideration by the Veterans' Administration, then the necessity for proof should rest upon the Government. I added that feature to the amendment because in reading the regulations, in some respects at least, I have been impressed that the effort on the part of the Veterans' Administration is to require a veteran to furnish proof himself for the purpose of reestablishing his claim, which I think is an absurd and ridiculous proceeding after the former decision had been rendered and he is already upon the rolls.

I mentioned yesterday, and I repeat, that the President, in his generosity and spirit of fairness, so the regulations state, advised the Veterans' Administration that in the cases of Spanish-American War veterans it would be difficult for them at this late day to furnish additional evidence to establish service connection, and that he therefore believes they should remain upon the roll as presumptive service-connected cases. Of course, that policy is absolutely correct, in my opinion. The Veterans' Administration in carrying out those regulations refers to this generous and righteous policy of our good President, but in addition to that they call upon the veterans to send proof to establish their service connection. We know what will be the consequence. In a very large majority of cases, the Spanish-American War having taken place 35 years ago, the veteran receiving a questionnaire will find that many of his witnesses are dead and gone. There were poor and very inadequate records kept during the Spanish-American War, as we all know who have given any consideration to the matter. All the veteran can do is to send back the questionnaire with very little information upon it except his own statement as to service connection. That reaches the Veterans' Administration and they say at once that the man has disproved his own case and removed the right of presumption of service connection which the President had declared would be a just policy in dealing with cases of that kind.

All through the regulations and questionnaire in regard to other features of the law there runs a similar effort to entrap the veteran on account of absence of additional proof and to get him in a position whereby the Veterans' Administration, upon a man's own statement, can declare that his is not a service-connected case.

Another very unreasonable feature is that they ask the veteran to give proof of the time of the inception of the case. The average veteran that might be stricken with tuberculosis and many other diseases cannot tell just when it began. Unless it is an injury or wound, he is unable to give any definite information. I dare say the average capable physician, when he diagnoses a case and finds tuberculosis or some other severe disease, could not tell what the causes were or when they occurred definitely. They could only give an approximate idea. Yet the Veterans' Administration seeks information of that character, which in my opinion is an unfriendly thrust toward the veterans and another effort to get an advantage of them in reviewing the cases.

I have been impressed, upon the information which I have received from time to time from veterans, which in many instances has been corroborated by the records in the Veterans' Administration, that there are hundreds and thousands of service-connected cases where the veteran is being mistreated and where his compensation has been reduced by an unreasonable percentage. My own records disclose reductions ranging from 30 percent to as high as 70 percent. The reductions approximating 70 percent mostly apply either to the blind or the bedridden or to veterans who lost a limb. I mentioned some of these instances yesterday.

In this morning's paper I notice a full page of propaganda addressed to Congress by the American Veterans' Association, signed by a man named Williams. It is not signed by any veterans' organization with which we are all familiar, not signed by a post of the American Legion or by a post of the Veterans of Foreign Wars, but is signed by the "American Veterans' Association." I have not been able to ascertain just what that organization is. At any rate, it is the desire on the part of that organization to persuade Congress not to correct the abuses which I think every Senator realizes exists, but to leave the matter an open chapter to be corrected by the Commander in Chief, though, in fact, of course, we all know the details and planning of these matters are handled by the Veterans' Administration and by Mr. Douglas, Director of the Budget, and not the President. No one man can serve as President and have the time to give personal attention to such details.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Is the Senator's amendment confined exclusively to service-connected cases?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Absolutely.

Mr. WALSH. It does not include presumptive cases?

Mr. TRAMMELL. No; it is confined to service-connected cases.

Mr. WALSH. The purpose of the amendment is to prohibit the Veterans' Administration from changing the ratings of service-connected disabled veterans by more than a 15-percent reduction?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Not in excess of a 15-percent reduction. That is the maximum. They can only reduce by not to exceed 15 percent, under my amendment. That is not an arbitrary percentage. That percentage is arrived at in view of the fact that Congress in its wisdom has deemed it proper to provide a reduction of only 15 percent as applied to civilian employees. That 15 percent applies as much to the $10,000 salary or the $15,000 salary as it does to the smaller salaries. I take the position that if Congress says that a man who is receiving a salary of $18,000 per annum—I mention that because there is one $18,000 per annum salary allowed in the very bill we are considering—if Congress takes the position that that man's salary should be reduced only 15 percent, it is the height of injustice to take the position, upon the other hand, that a patriotic veteran who served his country with credit and with loyalty and devotion should have his compensation of $20, $30, $40, to $100 reduced more than 15 percent. I cannot find any justification for saying that the man who receives a salary of $10,000 shall have his salary reduced only 15 percent, while the veteran receiving $90 a month, because through the misfortunes of war he lost his sight completely, shall have his compensation reduced from $90 a month to $20 a month.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I have just come into the Chamber. The Senator was speaking about veterans who were injured in battle, was he not?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I was referring to service-connected cases. This amendment does not apply to those that are not service connected.

Mr. COPELAND. Does the Senator know that there are now in Mount Alto Hospital veterans who have lost both arms, veterans who have lost both legs, men who were gassed in actual battle and now are suffering from active tuberculosis, who, under the operation of the present law, have their compensation cut one half?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I thank the Senator for mentioning those cases. I mentioned yesterday a case where one of these poor fellows was suffering from having been gassed during the war, and has been confined to hospitals practically all the time since, and was receiving a compensation of $100 a month, which, under the order of the Veterans' Bureau, has been reduced to $23 per month. He is a hospital subject now, and a very pitiful case, according to what he wrote me—and I believe he wrote me the truth in regard to the matter.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am very much in sympathy with placing some fixed limitation on the amount of reduction that can be made in strictly service-connected cases. I think every Member of the Senate has been absolutely shocked at individual cases that have been brought to our attention where men who even today are carrying German bullets in their bodies have had their compensation cut to as low as $8 a month; but would not the effect of the Senator's amendment as written be to freeze all of the existing service-connected cases, whether connected by presumption or otherwise, as well as battle casualties?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I think that even in the presumptive cases, if the Government sees fit to attack those cases, the burden of proof should be upon the Government.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am referring to the presumption established by statute.

Mr. TRAMMELL. This amendment would not bar them. As the Senator knows, nearly all the statutes are repealed by the Economy Act. That is one of the tragedies of this situation.

Mr. RUSSELL. Yes; but the Senator's amendment says that regardless of any provision of the Economy Act, the compensation in these cases shall not be reduced more than 10 percent.

Mr. TRAMMELL. But it does not bar the Government officials from making further inquiry into a case; and if they make inquiry into the case I do not think there is any law then that would authorize them to carry a presumptive case on the rolls if they find that it is merely presumptive.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator's amendment, though, would freeze the presumptive cases as of March 20, 1933.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Of course, if the Senator feels that way about it, he might propose an amendment to cover that feature of the matter. I should prefer not having an amendment of that kind, however. I remember that the first statute extending presumptions was in regard particularly to cases of tuberculosis. It was believed that where this disease had made itself so apparent that the doctors so diagnosed the case within a certain given time after the war the presumption would be that it had been contracted during the time of the war. If we do away entirely with the idea of any presumptive cases, of course we then enable the Veterans' Bureau, following out up to the present time what seems to be a very harsh policy, to strike off a great many people who probably are justly entitled to compensation on account of injuries or disease acquired during the war.

I should much prefer, of course, not to go into any details about the matter of presumption. I was not thinking particularly about that, however, when I prepared the amendment. I was thinking principally of trying to retain upon the rolls those who had service connection without their compensation being reduced in excess of 15 percent. Of course, I first placed the percentage at 10 percent instead of 15, and the amendment will be read in that form; but I propose to offer a modification to change that to 15 percent.

I do not see how we can possibly, with consistency, authorize a reduction in excess of 15 percent in view of the record of Congress. There is not anything offensive, there is not anything objectionable, in placing a limitation upon the amount of reduction that may be made. Are not the rights of the soldiers as sacred to Congress and to the American people as the rights of the civilian employees of this country? Yet Congress prescribed definitely that the President should not reduce the salaries of civilian employees in excess of 15 percent. Are we willing to prescribe definitely a maximum of reduction which may be made in regard to civilian employees and then refuse to prescribe a maximum reduction that may be made in soldiers' compensation?

I cannot see any consistency in a policy of that kind. Some others may entertain the view that we may treat with indifference the rights of the soldiers of our country; that we may not consider that we owe to them the duty of preserving their righteous interests by prescribing a maximum; but I do not think there is anybody in the Senate who feels that way. That, however, will be the consequence if the rules are not suspended and this amendment is not adopted. The past best tells the story of what we may expect in the future. The story of the past has been a wholesale, arbitrary abuse of reduction of the compensation of the service-connected veterans. There is ample proof here to show that.

Do we expect the men who were so heartless and so inconsiderate of these patriots of our country, who have served the Nation with a fidelity unexcelled by that of the soldiers of any land, as to promulgate and to put into execution such orders as they have in the past, to deal very generously with the veterans in the future?

Unless the President takes the situation in hand himself, and, through his generous and just spirit, directs definitely what shall be done, I anticipate that there is not going to be any very substantial remedy of the critical situation which exists at the present time, even in regard to the service-connected cases.

Of course, people have their own ideas as to how they will administer laws; but, while I do not like to call names, I should not expect the different agents in the Veterans' Administration, nor should I expect those who direct the Budget Bureau, so completely to face about and change their hearts of stone, as I see it, as to give any very generous treatment to our veterans.

It is these circumstances, these abuses, this lack of consideration and sympathetic consideration toward our veterans in the past, that make me think we might well judge the future by the past; and for that reason I should like to do what I conceive to be my duty. I therefore have proposed this amendment, hoping that it would correct in a degree a most tragic and pitiful situation that exists with thousands of America's heroes and veterans who in 1917 and 1918 went across the sea and fought the battles of the Nation, many of them falling upon Flanders fields while serving their country. Instead of trampling upon, as I see it, the right and the justice which should be extended to them, I would pay tribute to the living; I would revere the memory of those dead boys who sleep beneath the sod of Flanders fields, and rest beneath the sod in their homeland.

I never get any inspiration from people who are fighting justice, who would have an injustice done to their fellowman, whether he be a soldier or whether he be a civilian. I do not know the origin of this organization that wrote the page advertisement that appeared this morning, fighting against any adjustments, urging us to let the situation just rock along and take care of itself. I venture the assertion, however, that those back of that propaganda, if veterans, probably were, most of them, swivel-chair artists; most of them today live in affluence and plenty; and I dare say further that the propaganda inserted in the page advertisement in the Post this morning was inspired by the Economy League.

That organization ought never to have been called an "economy league." It ought to have been called a "tax-dodgers' league." That would have been a more appropriate name to apply to the so-called "Economy League", because it was supported mostly by the big interest of the country, by people who were afraid they would be taxed a little more. I would call them the "tax-dodging league" instead of the Economy League. I dare say they had something to do with the page advertisement that appeared in the Post this morning.

Regardless of that, I feel that I have a duty to perform. I think it is nothing at all out of the ordinary for Congress to exercise its authority and place a limitation upon the reductions that may be made in the compensation of veterans, just as Congress placed a limitation upon the reductions that could be effectuated in the salaries of civilian employees of the Government.

Mr. President, I hope very much that the motion for suspension of the rules will be adopted, and then that the amendment can be proposed and agreed to.

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, I intend to support the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to limit the power of the Executive in reducing compensation, pension, or allowance of any veteran or dependent to not more than 15 percent where the injury or disability is service connected.

It is not my intention to evade any responsibility of my own by attempting to pass it to the President or the Budget Director or the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs in this matter, but I do want to say that it never entered my mind, when I voted for the economy measure giving those broad powers to the President, that they would be abused as I believe them to have been abused in the regulations and rulings made by the Veterans' Administration regarding service-connected cases, and also pensions for the Spanish-American War veterans.

We have been promised, as I understand it, that these regulations will be liberalized. They should be liberalized. A great wrong has been done these veterans. As I have said before, this Nation's honor is just as important as a balanced Budget, and, as I see it, the Nation's honor is involved in fair and humane treatment of the veterans of our wars and their dependents.

The economy program approved by Congress reduced salaries of Government officials and employees only 15 percent. I say there is no good reason why we should reduce the compensation or allowances of the Nation's defenders more than 15 percent, especially when it applies to disabilities that are service connected.

There is no doubt that the Veterans' Administration has gone too far in its drastic economy program at the expense of the veterans. We have been assured that changes in regulations to correct this maladministration of the Economy Act will be made. But it seems to me that perhaps the Congress could make the job easier for the Veterans' Administration, for the Budget Director, and for the President, if we placed some limitation such as has been suggested by the Senator from Florida on the powers of the Executive.

Perhaps it is true that 90 percent of the most glaring injustices complained of could and will be corrected by changes in regulations and more leniency in applying the regulations; but I believe it also would be sound policy for Congress to indicate that the Veterans' Administration is expected to liberalize these regulations as to service-connected cases and interpret them fairly, instead of using them to cut and slash the compensation and allowances and pensions in every case.

The country desires that every deserving disabled veteran be adequately cared for. If it is necessary to make a larger appropriation than is called for in the pending bill, I am willing to vote for a larger appropriation. The Congress should not permit such outrages against justice as are contemplated in the Veterans' Administration's present program, even in the name of economy. I hope the Congress will not adjourn until the regulations issued under the Economy Act are liberalized or modified.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion of the amendment presented by its author, the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], and I find myself very much in sympathy with it. The attitude of the lay mind upon the subject of presumption is a problem which I have never been able to solve, for the reason that I cannot understand how the lay mind can ever interpret what is a reasonable presumptive period within which certain forms of disease may enter a soldier's body, or the body of any other human being, and remain there for an indefinite period of time and then become an outspoken manifestation.

Tuberculosis is one of those diseases which enters the human body without any definite period of incubation before it becomes an outspoken disease. The same principle applies to many of those diseases which are classified now under the neuropsychiatric rule. Yet we have laymen in control of and directing the destiny of the Veterans' Bureau, men recognized by the American people, even up to the President of the United States, taking the position and speaking definitely upon the presumptive period of many of the diseases to which the body of the American soldier is heir, limiting, by law, through their influence, the period in which presumption can be established so as to enable them to deny the soldier the care of the Government he has so well served.

Mr. President, in 1929 I discussed the subject of presumption before the Committee on Finance, and at that time I presented authorities upon the subject whose reputation and standing in the medical profession of the world is unquestioned. They state definitely and positively that tuberculosis may be taken into the human body, remain dormant there for even the period of a natural lifetime, or it may remain dormant for a long period of time, anywhere from 10 to 15 or 20 years, and then, because of lack of resistance, because of the lowering of the resistance of the body, because of mental worry, because of some condition that has broken down the resistance of the individual, the tubercular manifestation stored up in some little cavity, surrounded by a calcareous deposit, may break out, and the unfortunate individual develop a definite case of tuberculosis and rapidly pass into a state which ultimately saps from him his life.

The same history is applicable to neuropsychiatric conditions, starting in with a molecular involvement of small particles of brain tissue, resulting in a break of the electrical connection furnished by the brain cells which control the muscular and other coordinating systems of the human body, resulting in a beginning with a small yet detectable tremor of the extremities, which finally becomes an outspoken manifestation, resulting finally in the inability of the unfortunate individual who has developed this mental or neuropsychiatric condition to feed himself. The coordinating power of the individual becomes so impaired that it renders him a hopeless cripple, and often a subject of charity, or he must be protected and cared for by the Government of the United States.

Mr. President, this picture portrays the condition which confronts many of the American veterans at the present time. These manifestations have developed far beyond the period of presumption that is laid down by law, and in many cases they are directly traceable to the soldier's service.

Now we hear that the presumptive period is to be limited to 1 year. I want to say that 5 years is not enough. As I advocated before the Finance Committee of the Senate in 1929, 10 years will not cover the presumptive period in the cases of many of those boys who served in the World War.

When we consider the Spanish-American War veteran, and when we are told that diseases such as typhoid fever, paratyphoid, dysentery, amoebic, catarrhal, and the form of dysentery that is brought about by the Shiga bacillus; that out of 280,000 soldiers in the Spanish-American War who served in defense of this country, 289,000 cases of hospital admissions were recorded at one time or another, some of which were duplicates, as some of these men were hospitalized more than once; and when I say that out of the entire group of 280,000 men, 57,024 were stricken with some form of dysentery; and when I say that 20,904 were stricken either with typhoid or paratyphoid, then it seems to me that, with this kind of a record made by these men who so faithfully served our country in the Spanish-American War, when 3,362 died from various maladies and 379 were killed in action, I am impressed with the thought that our Government, through lack of the proper sanitary care, did not sufficiently protect the Spanish-American soldier or he would not have been stricken by these diseases whose mark upon his physical structure has not been eradicated by the passing of time; indeed, to the contrary, the seeds of these diseases are no doubt stored up in their bodies, serving as a basis for acute and new manifestations of diseases.

Mr. President, when a typhoid infection is developed the patient lies upon a sick bed suffering with a temperature averaging anywhere from 100 to 105 or 106, subjected in many instances to a disintegration of the glandular structure that is found in the alimentary canal. Not only that but the complications which arise result in some cases in infection of the gall bladder, reflecting itself in a general cholecystitis, or an infection of the common and cystic ducts, including the gall bladder, resulting in the forming of gall stones, 25, 30, yea 40 years after the primary involvement of typhoid fever was experienced by the individual soldier. This last-named disease reflects a new involvement in the soldier's body, springing from the primary disease, typhoid fever, and as a conclusive proof of the typhoid infection being the cause, typhoid bacilli is found to form the nucleus around which the stone is formed.

The same condition applies to dysenteric conditions, such as the amoebic form, causing abscesses of the liver, involving every part of the body because of this infection, and only the primary disease can be cured, in many cases, by surgical procedure, in which copious amounts of, or large antiseptic solutions are utilized for the destruction, by chemical action on the amoeba as it inhabits the human alimentary canal.

Take the manifestations of typhoid fever primarily, take the manifestations of typhoid fever secondarily, which involve the circulatory system of the human body, resulting in what is known as "phlebitis", or an infection of the venous part of the circulatory system resulting in the forming of emboli in the circulation, which in some instances are carried to the brain, producing paralysis, and in other instances to the heart, causing some form of an infection of the heart, bringing about a gluing of the valves, resulting in an organic condition of the heart. Is it any wonder that the Congress of the United States in years past, based no doubt upon some medical information they had, gave to the Spanish-American War veteran the opportunity to establish his claim, even to the point of permitting all those with a disability to be placed on the pension rolls? But today we find that same group of patriotic Americans whose names appeared upon the pension rolls almost obliterated therefrom because of their inability to come within the presumption that their disability is service connected. They cannot prove to the satisfaction of some man who, though not a trained physician, directs the destiny of the veterans and deals with these problems, that some bone lesion, which, from the medical point of view, is directly traceable to the primary typhoid infection, is thus directly traceable to it, and so the soldier is refused a service connection which will enable him to draw a pension. The same condition prevails in the case of other manifestations that secondarily develop, possibly years and years after the veteran has suffered the primary lesion from typhoid fever or some form of dysentery.

There were no accurate medical records kept of those veterans of the Spanish-American War. I want to say, Mr. President, perhaps, by way of forecast and recommendation to the Congress of the United States, that if the Government of the United States would do its plain duty toward this group of men it would put them upon a parity with those men who so valiantly served this Nation when there was a threatened destruction of the Union of the States from 1861 to 1865.

Mr. President, for the Government to say that we will not continue to protect these men who so faithfully and so patriotically served their country, regardless of any depression that may exist at the present time, regardless of any depression that may exist in the future, is, indeed, a disservice and a failure to pay rightful tribute to those who were patriotic and are devoted to the flag.

The Spanish-American War soldier did not have the advantage, Mr. President, of immunization from typhoid or from paratyphoid, for the reason that at that time there had not been completed and made practicable the discovery of the methods for immunization from these direful and distressing diseases.

I could go along, Mr. President, and give many reasons why I support this amendment. I spoke upon this subject in no uncertain terms on March 15, 1933, when the economy bill was before this body. I then pointed out the attitude of the former President upon the subject of presumption; also I pointed out the training and qualifications of the present Chief Executive, but, Mr. President, if it be correct, as I have heard it is, that the present Chief Executive is in sympathy with only a year being allowed as a presumptive period within which a soldier may connect his disability with some disease which he contracted in the service, I want to say that a great injustice will be done to the World War veterans. But, as I see it today, the greatest injustice that has been done is to the Spanish-American War veterans. In that war 280,000 men were in service; 57,024 were stricken with dysentery and 20,904 with typhoid fever, with all the complications that visit the human body as a result of the seeds left by these diseases, which extend over a period of development of 35 or 40 years. When I say 35 or 40 years, I make the statement advisedly, for it is supported by authority, and there is no dispute as to the long-continued period of incubation between the primary development and the secondary involvement from which many of the Spanish-American War soldiers are suffering today. Indeed, Mr. President, I have demonstrated this fact in my own professional experience. Yet we find that they are stricken from the roll, and must in many instances be the objects of charity.

A gentleman, 60 years of age, came into my office about 3 weeks ago, who had served all through the Spanish-American War, and who had served in the Philippines, and told me of the meager pension he was receiving in his disabled condition. He was suffering with an organic heart disease, which possibly was primarily developed from a typhoid infection which he incurred during his service in the Spanish-American War; it had become a heart involvement caused possibly from phlebitis, a complication from his typhoid, that made it impossible for him to walk up as many as three flights of steps without stopping to take his breath.

These are the pictures, Mr. President, that are being portrayed to the medical profession from one end of this Nation to the other; and I am just wondering whether or not there is enough patriotism left in the Congress of the United States to extend a helping hand to this class of patriotic Americans. I want to say that the distinguished Senator from Florida must have had the same experience that has come to my office, and I shall be glad to vote for and support his amendments in every way I can.

Mr. President, I have as another exhibit a report in the case of a ragged colored man who served overseas and whose loyalty and devotion to his country is attested by the captain under whom he served. His name is Marshall Clark. My experience with him reminds me of the poem, a paragraph of which portrays the old colored man as a worn-out rudder, broken and thrown away. He came into my office a few days ago clothed in rags, barefooted, Mr. President, and hungry. Here is the history of the case: The number of the case is C-1381119. The veteran filed application about March 4, 1932, with the regional office of the Veterans' Administration at Pittsburgh, giving his place of residence at that time as near Benwood, W.Va., where he worked in a coal mine. The allowance was awarded him on April 27, 1932, effective March 4, 1932, in the amount of $12 a month.

The veteran states that at the time he filed application for disability allowance he also asked for hospitalization, which was not furnished because no beds were available. He therefore left his place of residence and started for Washington on foot, with the hope of receiving hospitalization in one of the Washington hospitals. Thus he indicated his confidence, Mr. President, in the Government of the United States, for he felt if he could reach the central part of his Government that he would there find men who would extend a helping hand, because he had given his service and offered his life, if the country needed it, in support of his country. He became sick en route and was picked up on the road near Kingwood, W.Va., and sent to Washington by the American Legion at Kingwood. Arriving in Washington he applied to the Veterans' Administration for hospitalization, which was granted, and the veteran was sent to the Veterans' Home at Hampton, Va., on March 9, 1932, where he remained until December 25, 1932.

It appears from the records that the Pittsburgh regional office made several attempts to locate the veteran, which were not successful, and a stop payment was issued on the account September 7, 1932. In other words, Mr. President, there was no connection between the Pittsburgh office and the Veterans' Administration office in the city of Washington that would enable them to keep in touch and in control of those who were upon the hospital rolls of this country.

While the regional office at Pittsburgh was enlisting the assistance of the American Red Cross at Wheeling to locate the claimant, the veteran was under the care of the Veterans' Administration in the Veterans' Home at Hampton, Va.

Here we have the spectacle of one part of the organization seeking the location of the veteran, while another part of the Veterans' Administration was extending to him domiciliary care at Hampton, Va. It would seem that the records of his hospitalization should have been contained in his folder and that it would be an easy matter for any office, division, or section of the Veterans' Administration to consult this folder in order to obtain the proper address.

While at the home at Hampton, Va., the veteran was not aware that an award had been granted, and consequently had no knowledge that checks were due him and that another part of the Bureau was looking for him.

I am in receipt of a letter from the Veterans' Administration which reads in part, as follows:

> In view of the fact that no payments were made under the award prior to March 20, 1933, the date the World War Veterans' Act was repealed, no payments are now in order in view of precedents of the administration in this regard.

And so, Mr. President, this ragged soldier of fortune is without shelter, without clothes, without food, and is today an object of charity in the city of Washington.

The Veterans' Administration refuses to pay the veteran the amounts due him for disability allowance in accordance with the award made him, of $12 a month, commencing March 4, 1932, because no payments were made under the award prior to March 20, 1933, the date when the World War Veterans' Act was repealed. In other words, Mr. President, the administration of the Veterans' Bureau undertakes by regulation to make the law which was passed at this special session of Congress retroactive in dealing with this unfortunate veteran.

Thus it is shown that through no fault of the veteran the Veterans' Administration failed to deliver to him amounts due him under their own award, although he was for almost 10 months in the Veterans' Administration Hospital at Hampton, having been sent there by the Washington office, through Dr. W. L. Kline, an outstanding physician, a man who is entitled to the confidence of the soldier because of his great ability as a physician. The veteran's folder, if the papers were properly kept, should have had a record of his hospitalization.

This is just a sample of the injustice that is being done to many of those who served their country in its time of need; just like the picture I portrayed yesterday of the treatment being accorded the unfortunate World War veteran who lost his limb at the hip in the Argonne; just like the picture of the manner in which the boy who sustained a fracture of his spine, and who is now in a state of progressive paralysis, which will finally become complete, is being treated under the guise of economy by the Federal Government. He has been reduced from $90 to $40 a month for himself and his wife.

But due to the repeal of all veterans' laws by the so-called economy law the veteran has no redress, and section 5 of that obnoxious measure provides that the decision of the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs shall be final and not subject to review by the courts.

The veteran, the old colored soldier, is now in Washington, penniless and hopeless, although by every just and moral right he is entitled to clothes and $150, but due to the inefficiency of the Government or its lack of sympathy for these ragged soldiers no relief apparently is to come. He has been deprived of what is justly due him.

Mr. President, in support of what I have said and in support of the patriotism of this veteran, black though the texture of his skin may be, I offer for the RECORD a letter, not addressed to him but "to whom it may concern", signed by Frederick F. Wright, formerly first lieutenant of Company M, Eight hundred and second Pioneer Infantry, American Expeditionary Forces, whose home address is Newark, Ohio, and who is connected with the First National Bank of that city. I ask that the letter may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. WHEELER in the chair). Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

To those whom it may concern:

This is to certify that the bearer, Marshall Clark, was a corporal in the third platoon, Company M, Eight hundred and second Pioneer Infantry, of which I was first lieutenant. That he served with me faithfully and well from the time that we left the United States, about September 13, 1918, until we returned, July 1, 1919. That he was on active duty during our tour of duty in the Meuse-Argonne offensive, incurred neuritis, and after our return to Sable, Department of the Sarthe, was sent to the hospital in Angiers, where he stayed about two months. That he rejoined the company and came back with us to the United States, being honorably discharged at Camp Lee, Va. That his record was good, that his disability was incurred in line of duty. I will be glad to make further affidavits or answer any further questions concerning this man and his case.

FREDERICK F. WRIGHT,
Formerly First Lieutenant, Company M,
Eight hundred and second Pioneer Infantry, A.E.F.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to detain the Senate longer in the discussion of this question. My position is well known. My convictions are based upon a study of my profession extending over a period of 40 years and in active application of the principles of that profession which I learned in my early life and which I carry on at the present time. Soon after I took the oath in the Senate I raised my voice in protest against the kind of treatment that was being given to the veterans. I went before the Finance Committee. Knowing that there was only one other member of the medical profession who is a Member of this honorable body, I felt that I should endeavor to present a picture based upon the medical authorities of this and other lands dealing with the subject of presumption. I have followed up this admonition at every opportunity that has presented itself down to the present time, even in dealing with the economy legislation which struck a fatal blow to the protection which the veterans of all wars have looked forward to in this period of depression.

I took this position not because of poltics—not because it was my purpose to criticize anyone, either Democrat or Republican—but because I was impressed, as I always have been, with the patriotism, the genuineness of the devotion of the soldiers who have served our country from the beginning down to the present time, feeling because of the knowledge I possess in a professional way that my colleagues in the Senate of the United States would want to know what was fair and just and equitable to the soldiers of the Civil War, to the soldiers of the Spanish-American War, and to the soldiers of the World War.

Mr. President, I offer some telegrams from Spanish-American veterans' posts of West Virginia and ask that they may be printed in the RECORD at this point.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The telegrams are as follows:

H. D. HATFIELD,
United States Senator, Washington, D.C.:
We urge that you use your influence to postpone adjournment of Congress until adjustment of veterans' cut is made, especially in regard to service-connected disabilities.

E. E. CASSELL,
Post Commander Painter Porroni Post 1021, of Coalwood, W.Va.

WELCH, W.VA., June 2, 1933.

Senator H. D. HATFIELD,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D.C.:
Urge that you use influence against adjournment of Congress until adjustments are made in veterans' cuts.

R. H. POWELL,
Department Commander V.F.W.

ELKINS, W.VA., June 1, 1933.

Senator H. D. HATFIELD:
Earnestly urge use your influence to put Spanish War veterans under economy program same plane as Civil War veterans. Our men voluntarily gave their services and are now too old to procure work or to perform work if procured. Drastic cuts in compensation would cause hardship and suffering. Almost impossible to prove claims of service origin on account deaths of witnesses. Injustice should not be done us.

CRAWFORD SCOTT,
Commander Zan F. Collett Camp, No. 4,
United Spanish War Veterans.

WHEELING, W.VA., June 2, 1933.

Senator HENRY D. HATFIELD,

T. FRED KLENCKE, Commander.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Costigan	Kendrick	Robinson, Ark.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, may I inquire what is the pending question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending question is the motion to suspend rule XVI for the purpose of considering the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL].

Mr. LONG. If, as I understand it, there is going to be no objection to that procedure, I do not desire to say anything at this time. I understood there was some effort being made to bring about a harmonious understanding, and I do not want to delay consideration of the bill if that is going to be the result.

Mr. BYRNES. I intended to make a statement. If the Senator will yield to me, I will make a short statement to the Senate; and then I should like to ask for a vote on this amendment.

Mr. LONG. Go ahead and make the statement. Then we will see about the vote.

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator from Louisiana has the floor.

Mr. LONG. That is all right. I mean to yield to the Senator, so that he may take the floor. I mean to give the floor to the Senator.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I hope that the motion to suspend the rules for the consideration of the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] will not be adopted.

Before the appropriation bill was reported to the Senate the President announced that he believed, as a result of the application of the regulation adopted governing service-connected disabilities, that the cut in such cases was too severe, and that he would cause a review to be made of the regulation as to this class and all other classes affected by the regulation.

Two days ago I announced in the Senate that as a result of this review the President had determined that before July 1 a new regulation would be adopted, under which the cut in the compensation of the service-connected disabilities would be approximately 18 to 20 percent below the average compensation for such disabilities under the old law.

While this regulation would provide payments upon a different basis from the old law, the amount of money that the new regulation to be announced by the President would provide for service-connected disabilities is approximately the amount that would be provided by the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING].

Therefore I have no objection to the adoption of the Cutting amendment. I am authorized to state to the Senate that the President, following his announcement of a review of other classes and groups, has determined that the new regulation affecting Spanish-American War veterans will provide that those veterans over 62 years of age shall receive a minimum of $15. The rate of compensation in the case of the Spanish-American War veterans over 62 and suffering from disabilities has not been definitely determined, but will be determined within a very few days. Nor has there been a definite determination as to the regulation to be adopted affecting cases presumed to be of service origin or of widows who were affected by the original regulation; but in accordance with the statement issued by the President some days ago, and before this bill was reported to the Senate, consideration is now being given by him to these other groups and to all other classes affected by the regulation with a view of effecting the most humane treatment of veterans.

Mr. President, I believe that the adoption of the motion to suspend the rules would be unwise, because, according to the information I have received, the Trammell amendment would cost approximately $190,000,000; and I believe that if the President is given an opportunity to proceed to work out in an intelligent and in a humane way the compensation to be paid to the veterans justice will be done. Under the Trammell amendment all manner of cases—misconduct cases and all others—would be restored, and the compensation would be paid, less the 15 percent. In other words, under it there could not be a reduction greater than 15 percent.

I ask that the motion be not adopted.

Mr. BRATTON. Mr. President, I desire to ask the Senator a question.

Mr. BYRNES. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. BRATTON. I am in full sympathy with the amendment my colleague [Mr. CUTTING] intends to offer later, and I shall support it. I do not know whether the distinguished Senator from South Carolina, in charge of the bill, is in position to quote the President, and I do not ask him to do so; but I should like to know whether he thinks adequate provision will be made in the modified regulations to take care of the so-called "presumptive cases."

The Senator is mindful of the fact that there are many presumptive tubercular cases which are easily distinguished from other classes of disability, because of the peculiar characteristics of that disability. Does the Senator believe that adequate provision will be made through the modified regulations to care for the so-called "presumptive tubercular cases" and other presumptive cases?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, as I stated a moment ago, I am not in position to state what amount will be allowed or what is to be done with those cases. I am in position to state that the question as to the presumptive cases and as to the status of the widows who formerly received pensions is now being considered by the President; and while I cannot state what is going to be done, I express my own opinion that they will be handled in a satisfactory way. I am not, however, authorized to make a statement as to what the President intends to do on that question.

I desire to repeat what I stated a few moments ago, that I am in favor of the Cutting amendment, and I do not intend to make a point of order on that amendment provided it is not materially changed hereafter.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President——

Mr. BYRNES. I yield to the Senator from Rhode Island.

Mr. HEBERT. The Senator from South Carolina has stated that a minimum allowance will be given Spanish War veterans over the age of 62. Is the Senator in position to tell the Senate what proportion of the men of that service are included within that provision?

Mr. BYRNES. No. That refers to the class of Spanish-American War veterans who, under the old law, automatically receive a pension at the age of 62. As to those cases, under the regulation a minimum of $15 will be provided; and then if a man over 62 and in that group is disabled the compensation will be higher, the exact amount not having been determined.

Mr. HEBERT. In proportion to disability?

Mr. BYRNES. Yes.

Mr. HEBERT. Another question, Mr. President: I have had numerous complaints from World War veterans about the reduction in their compensation. I had one only yesterday. A man told me he was totally disabled, permanently disabled, and had been given compensation at the rate of $100 per month, and that compensation was reduced to $40 a month.

Mr. BYRNES. Under the Cutting amendment, if the disability was of service origin, such cases could not be reduced more than 25 percent; and that, as I say, is the amendment I intend to agree to and vote for.

Mr. HEBERT. So that with the passage of this amendment that particular veteran would have $75 in the future?

Mr. BYRNES. Seventy-five dollars; that is right.

Mr. HEBERT. I thank the Senator.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President——

Mr. BYRNES. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. HAYDEN. I should like to ask one other question with respect to the Spanish-American War veterans. The answers made by the Senator from South Carolina to other Senators are reassuring to me so far as they go; but how about the presumption with respect to Spanish-American War veterans? Does the Senator mean, when he states to the Senate that the entire question of presumption is now being considered by the President, that that includes not only presumption of World War veterans but presumption of Spanish War veterans?

Mr. BYRNES. My understanding as to the question of presumption is that the whole question is to be gone into and is being considered by the President now.

Mr. HAYDEN. I ask that question because, as to Spanish-American War veterans, the difficulty is to obtain proof 30 years after the military service was rendered.

Mr. BYRNES. Absolutely.

Mr. HAYDEN. And the presumption is essential to them.

Mr. BYRNES. The principle must be settled definitely as to all.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, before the question is put before the Senate I desire to state that if this motion to suspend the rules prevails, I expect to ask to modify my amendment so as to strike out the maximum of 10 percent reduction and provide that no reduction in excess of 15 percent shall be made. Of course, these figures are largely arbitrary, but I base the 15 percent upon the policy laid down by Congress in dealing with civil employees of the Government, the policy laid down in regard to dealing with a $10,000 salary, a $12,000 salary, and a $15,000 salary.

The Government, through its Congress, has refused to reduce any salaries more than 15 percent. I think that is a righteous position in regard to the smaller salaries, of course. We do not want absolutely to deprive the persons receiving such salaries of sufficient to live upon. When, however, it comes to the question of salaries of $10,000, we do not leave it to the President to say that he can reduce them over 15 percent, but we say that he must not reduce them more than 15 percent. In other words, in the case of a person who is so fortunate today as to have a salary of $12,000 per annum, if the President wanted to reduce him 25 percent, we have barred him from doing so by providing by legislation that he shall not reduce the employee below 15 percent. I think the soldiers, the veterans of the country, are entitled to equal consideration and that their compensation or pension should not be reduced in a larger percentage than we authorize the President to reduce the salaries of civilian employees.

Of course, if, when the economy bill was up, we had provided by an amendment that these larger salaries could be reduced 25 percent, then there would be some consistency in refusing to place a limitation upon the reduction of the veterans' compensation above 25 percent. But when Congress has gone on record at this session a number of times in opposition to reducing the salaries of civilian employees in the higher brackets more than 15 percent, even in the case of the person, as I say, who is fortunate enough to have a salary of ten, twelve, or fifteen thousand dollars—and there are several $10,000 salaries involved in the very bill we are considering; there is one $18,000 salary involved in this bill, and there are two other $12,000 salaries—if we say that we are not going to make a reduction of over 15 percent in those salaries and will not allow the President to do it, why do we not amend the law and allow the President to reduce the salaries of civilian employees without any limitation, or amend it so that he can reduce them 25 percent?

The only group of our people that have been picked out as the targets of this character of policy are our veterans. We propose to allow a reduction in their compensation in excess of what we are willing to permit under legislative enactment. We have tied the hands of the President and said that he could not reduce the salaries of civilian employees exceeding 15 percent; and that applies to the high salary just as it applies to the low salary. Yet the Senator in charge of the bill prefers now an amendment that would permit the President to reduce the compensation of veterans and of pensioners 25 percent.

I am appealing for the same kind of treatment for the veterans of our country that we are according to the civilians of our country. I think the veterans are worthy and deserving of it, and that the Nation can do no less in honor and in tribute to these gallant men who fought for our country than to deal justly by them.

I hope the motion will prevail.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Massachusetts?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do.

Mr. WALSH. One of the things that trouble me about the Senator's amendment is that it removes any elasticity in the making of rates by the Veterans' Administration in cases where there has been improvement in the physical condition of a veteran. In other words, the flat restriction which the Senator makes in the amendment would prevent the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs from reducing 40 or 50 percent the compensation to a given veteran where medical authorities state there has been an improvement in his condition that justifies it. I ask the Senator whether, in case the rules be suspended by vote of the Senate, the Senator will be willing to modify his amendment so that there would be an opportunity to vest in the Veterans' Administration the power to exercise a little elasticity in adjusting rates?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I appreciate the wisdom of the Senator's suggestion, but I think he is laboring under a misapprehension as to the effect of and the construction which should be given to the amendment which I have proposed. The amendment does not bar a reclassification, it does not bar a review of a case; but it provides that if the administration attempts to review, the burden of proof shall be upon the Government. I think that is a very righteous policy. It is the character of procedure which prevails in all the courts and other tribunals of the country. When a man once establishes his case and somebody wants to disestablish it, the burden of proof is upon the one who complains.

Mr. WALSH. With the permission of the Senator from Florida, I inquire of the junior Senator from Georgia whether he has not been informed, as I understood I was informed, by one of the experts or legal advisers of the Veterans Administration, that this amendment would prevent any elasticity in adjusting rates in the event of improved physical condition on the part of the veteran.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, I did not inquire of the expert as to that particular point.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I do not care what the expert said. If the expert made that statement, his legal knowledge and his legal interpretation would not go far with me. I have heard a great deal about these legal experts and such people to whom matters are referred. A fourth of the time we find such an expert to be some little incompetent who is called an expert, and Senators come into the Senate and vote his views, when he is no lawyer at all of any consequence, probably some favored pet who has gotten on the pay roll at $2,000, and has been boosted to seven or eight thousand dollars per year in 2 or 3 months. He knows probably less law than some of the students up in Georgetown University or George Washington University. I do not give much weight to them.

TWO-BY-FOUR RULERS OVER VETERANS

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I was about to propound a question to the Senator from Florida about these little 2-by-4 experts, if they could be given that dimension. I was going to put a statement in the form of a question to the Senator from Florida, had he not taken his seat, by saying that these 2-by-4 experts, if they could have credit for that dimension, are exercising more power over the veterans than the 96 Members of the United States Senate. How long are we going to sit here and see people turned out of hospitals and starved to death by these little 2-by-4, squint-eyed experts, fumbling around under their desks and issuing pronunciamentos, and exercising more authority than the 96 Members of the United States Senate? It is one of the most disgraceful things that have ever occurred in the history of our country.

They are brought here from one side of the country to the other, looking for jobs. Some of us may land some one of them a job—no; I will say some of you. I have not landed any. I have not been that lucky. I have tried my hand at it, but I have not succeeded. You land them here in a little office, trying to get them something to eat, and find them up there parceling out rules and regulations—"class Z", "class XY", "subsection 2", "rule AB-1." By the time you get the things in your mind, all they have ever managed to do around here is to confuse matters and do nobody any good. But we allow them to come in and draw as high as $10,000 a year, when, even if they would take the gum out of their mouths, they could not be sold into slavery for $500. Half of them could not be sold into slavery for their lifetime for $500. [Laughter.] Then they get a piece of confidential information and get a radio contract at a thousand dollars a week to let the public in on the inside of what is going to happen next week or tomorrow morning.

Mr. President, that is the kind of messing we are doing around here. Instead of being men, standing up on 2 legs and 2 feet, and running this Government for the people of the United States, we are authorizing some little 2-by-4, two-bit job-hunting politician to prescribe limits and rules under which he will work, and then he goes off and does what he pleases. That is the trouble with the whole "plague-take-it" outfit, and that is the reason why the veterans are in the fix in which they find themselves today. I favor suspending the rule.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from New Mexico a question. There is a very small group of soldiers who are totally blind, who sustained their injuries in combat, who, under the regulations as now promulgated, following the Economy Act, are cut 12½ percent. Would the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico cut such men 25 percent?

Mr. CUTTING. Oh, no, Mr. President; the Senator is in error if he thinks that. My amendment contemplates a limit of 25-percent reduction over what the veterans were getting under the old regulations. It does not mean that anybody needs to be cut at all. It merely fixes a limit of 25 percent beyond which the President cannot go.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. It fixes a maximum to which the President may go?

Mr. CUTTING. That is it. Under the present regulations, as they have been issued, in many cases the totally blind veteran may have been cut 75 or 80 percent. I do not know of any particular case, though I have heard of cases where they have been cut that far.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I might say to the Senator that I know of one case where a totally blind soldier, who also lost his leg, has actually been cut 55 or 60 percent; I do not know whether it was quite as much as 75 percent or not.

Mr. CUTTING. I mentioned the fact yesterday that Mr. Douglas, the Director of the Budget, in testifying before the Committee on Finance, said he thought those veterans ought to get $275 a month. That is more than they are getting at the present time.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH. I am very much obliged to the Senator.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] to suspend the rules.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BAILEY (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS]. I do not know how he would vote if present. I therefore withhold my vote.

Mr. McADOO (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE]. I do not know how he would vote, and I therefore withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] on international matters for the Government, and the absence of the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] on official business.

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL], the Senator from Iowa [Mr. MURPHY], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. ADAMS], and the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] are absent on official business.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, on this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], who is absent. If he were present, he would vote "yea." If permitted to vote, I would vote "nay."

Mr. HEBERT. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] has a pair with the senior Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY].

I am informed that if the Senator from Delaware were present, on this vote he would vote "yea."

I also desire to announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] is necessarily absent. If present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. FRAZIER. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. NYE] is absent on official business. If he were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, it having been announced that the Senator from Delaware, if present and voting, would vote "yea", I wish to say that if I were permitted to vote I would vote "nay."

The result was—yeas 59, nays 21, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. Two thirds of the Senators present having voted in the affirmative, the rule is suspended, and the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] is declared to be in order. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I wish to suggest a modification of the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida modifies his amendment. The clerk will state the amendment as modified.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I have sent to the desk the modification and ask that the clerk may report the amendment as modified.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk advises the Chair that he has the amendment as modified.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The amendment, as modified, is as follows:

On page 61, between lines 6 and 7, add a new section, as follows:

"That title I of Public, No. 2, is hereby amended by adding thereto the following:

"'SEC. 21. That regardless of any provisions embraced in title I of an act to maintain the credit of the United States Government, being Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, the compensation or the pension of those veterans who on March 20, 1933, were drawing compensation or pension or may hereafter be granted compensation or pension on account of service-connected disability, shall not be reduced more than 15 percent below the compensation or pension to which they were entitled on March 20, 1933. In any review of a veteran's case by the Veterans' Administration with a view to reducing the rating of or change the cause of his disability the burden of proof shall rest upon the Government.'"

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida, as modified.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, unless the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] chooses to offer the amendment himself, I shall propose an amendment to the amendment, as follows: On line 8, to strike out "15" and insert "25."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas to the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

Mr. NORRIS and Mr. LONG addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to call attention to what seems to me to be an error in the amendment of the Senator from Florida. As I understand the reading by the clerk of the amendment, as modified, it provides that the limitation on the reduction shall apply as to any soldier who on a certain date was on the rolls, and shall also apply as to any soldier who hereafter shall be placed on the rolls. That leaves a gap between the date named in the amendment and the present time to which the amendment would not apply. There probably are a good many who between the date named and the present date have been placed on the rolls. Their compensation could be reduced, regardless of this amendment, if I understand the reading of the amendment correctly. I may be wrong; I have not examined the amendment but merely heard it read.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I do not know but that the amendment is probably subject to that criticism.

Mr. NORRIS. If I may have the copy of the amendment, I will read it.

The amendment reads as follows:

That regardless of any provisions embraced in title I of an act to maintain the credit of the United States Government, being Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, the compensation of those veterans who on March 20, 1933, were drawing compensation or pension or may hereafter be granted compensation or pension—

That would leave those veterans between this date and March 20, 1933, outside the provisions of the amendment. It seems to me that is plain, and I want to suggest to the Senator from Florida further to modify the amendment so as to read:

Or may after said date be granted compensation or pension.

Mr. TRAMMELL. How would the amendment then read?

Mr. NORRIS. The amendment now reads "hereafter." That means after the passage of this act.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I realize that there is a little period which the language of the amendment would not cover. I desire that it shall be covered. What is the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska in regard to that? What does the Senator suggest?

Mr. NORRIS. I suggest that, instead of "hereafter", the Senator use the words "or may after said date be granted compensation or pension."

Mr. TRAMMELL. I am agreeable to the suggestion made by the Senator from Nebraska. I think that it is a very desirable correction to be made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Florida further modifies his amendment. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], as modified.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, before the amendment to the amendment shall be voted on I should like to direct attention to the feature of this amendment which I think is fundamentally important, and I especially should like the attention of the Senator from Florida with respect to it. Both the amendment which he had printed and the amendment which I understand he now offers as a modification commences with the language:

That regardless of any provisions embraced in title I of an act to maintain the credit of the United States Government, being Public, No. 2—

And so forth.

This amendment is offered as an amendment to Public Law No. 2. It could very well provide, "That nothing contained in this act shall have a certain effect." It strikes me that it is a little awkward, and it may be hurtful, to word the amendment as it is presently phrased. Would not the Senator look with favor on a proposal to simplify the language so as to take away the incongruity of referring in the amended act to the act itself?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I am rather of the impression that the way the amendment is drawn is better. As it is now drawn there is nothing that is offensive, and it will, I think, accomplish the purpose. Of course, it is merely a matter of the selection of phraseology. Some people would like to amend the Lord's Prayer.

Mr. STEIWER. The Senator realizes that I am trying to be helpful.

I think there is another thing the Senator from Florida and all of us should consider with respect to this matter. The Economy Act, so called, in section 17, contained a limitation provision which was known at the time the matter was under debate as the "Walsh amendment" and which provides as follows:

The provisions of this title shall not apply to the compensation or pension (except as to rates, time of entry into active service, and special statutory allowances), being paid to veterans disabled, or dependents of veterans who died, as the result of disease or injury directly connected with active military or naval service—

And so forth.

That will still be in the law.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. STEIWER. Yes; I yield if I have the floor.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In place of the amendment which I offered a few moments ago it is my purpose to offer a substitute for the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida, which substitute, I think, will meet the criticism which the Senator from Oregon is now making. The language I shall propose as a substitute is the language of the so-called "Cutting amendment", the Senator from New Mexico having indicated his intention not to offer the amendment. I ask, with the permission of the Senator from Oregon, that the amendment in the nature of a substitute may be read at the desk.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I shall be glad to have it read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the clerk will report the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the Senator from Arkansas.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Section 17 of title I of the act approved March 20, 1933, entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", is amended by adding at the end of the section the following:

"Nothing in this act shall authorize the President to reduce to a degree greater than 25 percent the compensation, pension, or allowance of any veteran or dependent of a veteran whose disability has hitherto been traced officially to direct connection with military or naval service (otherwise than by benefit of presumption)."

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. STEIWER. I desire to make some observations about the proposal last submitted, but I shall be glad to yield to the Senator.

Mr. CONNALLY. I should like to suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that, while I agree with his amendment as far as it goes, it will not take care of Spanish-American War veterans at all, because the service connection in those cases cannot be established, as is admitted by all. If the Senator from Arkansas would also provide something like the following to be added at the end of his amendment, I think it would be unanimously agreed to:

Pensions of veterans of any war prior to the World War shall not be reduced more than 25 percent of the rate being received on March 15.

That would conform to his idea as to World War veterans and would make the same rule applicable to Spanish-American War veterans.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the objection to that suggestion is that it would apply to non-service-connected disability cases as well as to service-connected disability cases.

Mr. CONNALLY. The point is, if the Senator will permit me further, with the indulgence of the Senator from Oregon, that under the old law there was not that distinction between service-connected and non-service-connected cases; and the act granting——

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I will yield in just a moment. The act granting Spanish-American War veterans pensions was based not upon service-connected disability but actual physical disability, and there was no necessity for those veterans proving service connection. Consequently they did not prove it; and now it is too late; they cannot prove it; and the operation of the present regulations, according to the Veterans' Administration, will be that more than half of all the Spanish-American War veterans will be cut entirely off without any pension whatever, they having been recognized for years as pensioners.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. STEIWER. I yield.

Mr. CLARK. There is no way for the Spanish War veterans to prove their service-connected disability for the reason that records were not kept during the Spanish-American War in the way they were kept during the World War.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, it is for that reason that I have an amendment pending providing that veterans of the Spanish-American War past 62 years of age shall be presumed to be properly on the roll.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I believe I have the floor?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Oregon has the floor.

Mr. STEIWER. The proposal which the Senator from Arkansas has just offered is also subject to certain objections which he probably has not had opportunity fully to consider. One objection is in case a veteran shows marked improvement he could not be rerated and his pension could not be cut even though he would effect complete recovery. Another is that there will be no opportunity for the Government to protect itself against the so-called "fraud cases."

Another possible objection relates to the form in which it is stated at the end of section 17. I am not sure that I am correct in this, but it occurs to me that there is some conflict between the proposal made and the language contained in the Walsh amendment. I observe the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] is here, and I am wondering if he does not agree with me that if an adequate and proper proposal were agreed to in the Senate which would protect the service-connected cases his amendment might well be removed from the act, and that the proper way to make the amendment, in order to avoid conflict and confusion, is to strike from section 17 the language of the amendment secured by the Senator from Massachusetts to that act and to substitute for it language that will effectually carry out the purpose which the Senator from Massachusetts had at the time he offered his amendment. I am not speaking of either the 15-percent or 25-percent proposal. I hope the Senator from Arkansas will withhold his suggestion until we can agree on the structure of the amendment itself.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, if the Senator from Oregon will yield——

Mr. STEIWER. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. I think my amendment that is now in the law should be further amended so as to take care of the cases that the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] desire to take care of.

May I add to what the Senator has already said that the amendments are drawn so broadly that they would violate the provisions of the Presidential regulations—which we all agree should not be done—in two particulars in addition to what he has already mentioned, namely, veterans who are members of veterans' administrative facilities. There is a provision that when a veteran goes to a hospital his compensation will be suspended, and he will get only $15 if single; and if he is married, then his family will get the balance. Nobody wants to bring that back. Everybody agrees that regulation is correct.

A further regulation that would be interfered with by the other amendment is one providing that those who live outside of the continental limits of the United States under these regulations will be cut 50 percent. I think most would agree that that is reasonable in any case.

Mr. STEIWER. I have that in mind.

Mr. WALSH. Though most of us do not feel they are in condition to require any correction of the regulations, both those classes would be given the benefits of these amendments. If opportunity presents itself, I would offer an amendment to my amendment which would take care of that particular class of veterans we all are desirous of taking care of, and yet not permit the elasticity in which the Veterans' Administration has indulged in rerating the entire number of service-connected veterans.

Mr. STEIWER. Let me advise the Senator of a step I have taken with respect to the matter, with the knowledge that the amendment offered by the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] and other amendments offered here do not deal with all of the incidents or detailed matters that are involved. I asked the legislative counsel to prepare a form of substitute amendment, and in their preparation of it they consulted the Veterans' Administration, I am told. I personally did not do so. They have prepared a form of substitute which would permit the regulations now made by the President to remain in force and effect so far as the veterans outside of the United States are concerned and to remain in effect so far as those enjoying hospitalization are concerned. I should like to send this proposed substitute to the desk and have it read for the information of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

On page 1, strike out lines 1 to 12, both inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"The second paragraph of section 17 of title I of the act entitled 'An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government,' approved March 20, 1933, is amended to read as follows:

"'Nothing in this title shall authorize the President to reduce by more than 15 percent the rates of compensation, pension, or emergency officers' retired pay heretofore authorized for death or disability resulting from disease or injury connected with military or naval service, either directly or by statutory or regulatory presumption of service connection, by any law in effect on the date of enactment of this act; except that the provisions of this paragraph shall not apply with respect to veterans residing outside the limits of the continental United States or with respect to any veteran who is being furnished hospital treatment, institutional, or domiciliary care by the United States, or any political subdivision thereof, if such veteran has neither wife, child, nor dependent mother or father.'"

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas rose.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, before the Senator from Arkansas cross-examines me with respect to the matter, let me make a brief further statement regarding it. It does not attempt to change the basic principle of the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL]. It provides a limitation of 15 percent in cut of service-connected pension, compensation, and retirement fee; unlimited, however, with respect to the method by which they have been connected. That is to say, it gives the same protection to those compensations and pensions that have been service connected by presumption as it does to those who have been directly connected by proof. It is noticed that the proposal would strike from Public, No. 2 the amendment known as the "Walsh amendment", and would replace it with this language, which I think would carry into the law every purpose of the Senator from Florida, but it would enable the Veterans' Administration to rerate cases where there have been recoveries, it would enable them to remove fraud cases, it would enable them to maintain present regulations with respect to veterans outside of the United States, and to maintain the proposed regulations in respect to those men who are enjoying or receiving hospitalization. Of course it does not deal with the question of percentage, as suggested by the Senator from Arkansas.

I have some doubt whether it is in order, so I am wondering whether the Senator from Arkansas will not withdraw his proposal and let me offer this one so he may then offer his amendment with respect to the question of percentage.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the difficulty of writing a complex bill on the floor of the Senate is well exemplified in connection with the amendments proposed to the independent offices appropriation bill, particularly those relating to veterans' allowances. It is almost impossible to work out changes in the law that will be effective and satisfactory. I wish to make clear the position which I occupy on this subject.

It is fully realized that the announcements which have been made touching some of the rules and regulations that have been framed for the enforcement of the so-called "Economy Act" and their application to particular cases have created a somewhat stormy reaction in both Houses of the Congress. Let me say in all fairness that it could not have been reasonably expected that a subject matter of so great importance, one which discontinues or contemplates the discontinuance of allowances in the aggregate amount made possible by the Economy Act, could be accomplished without some instances of injustice, without mistakes, and without necessity for corrections.

The President has no purpose to commit himself or his administration to any rules or regulations that work injustices to beneficiaries of veterans' allowances. On the contrary, it is his desire to make such readjustments as will eliminate frauds, as will protect the Treasury of the United States against expenditures that are not just, as will safeguard fairly the rights and interests of the veterans.

We might well have foreseen that the matter could not be worked out to the satisfaction of everyone. We might not, however, readily have anticipated that the cases of hardship which have been described on the floors of the two Houses would have arisen. We should have known, in our anxiety to accomplish the general purpose of economy by limiting veteran allowances to just and necessary cases, that complaints inevitably would follow, and that readjustments would become essential.

My view is that the President should be given the opportunity to work out the difficulties that have arisen; that the Senate should not undertake, in the consideration of an appropriation bill, to rewrite veteran legislation; and if it does so there probably will result mistakes which will call for correction hereafter.

Probably no plan that we can adopt will prevent the possibility of injustice in some cases, either to the Government itself or to the veterans who are to receive benefits under the legislation.

The adoption of the Trammell amendment is in large measure a repeal of the Economy Act. The eagerness demonstrated in the Senate in the matter not only illustrates and emphasizes a desire to correct mistakes and errors that have been made, but it also exemplifies the correctness of the position taken, that it is very difficult—in fact, next to impossible—for the Congress to work out these details in legislation without reference to the action of a committee.

I know perfectly well the sentiment that prevails here. I know the forces that are driving to what may prove to be mistakes, to what may result in the final defeat of the independent offices appropriation bill; but I am taking my measure of responsibility now by proposing that instead of a 15-percent maximum limitation on the amount of reduction that may be made we agree to a 25-percent reduction.

There are many cases in which a maximum reduction of 25 percent may be applied without unfairness and without injustice; and I believe every Senator here knows that there is no sound basis for any arbitrary percentage. If we are to adopt an arbitrary percentage limiting the reductions we must adopt such a percentage as will permit a fair readjustment in a large number of cases. In my opinion, the 15-percent limitation will not accomplish that result. It will occasion such expense to the Government that it will operate in a practical sense as a repeal of the provisions of the Economy Act having relation to veteran compensation.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. Without taking the time of the Senate, I should like to state that the Senator from Arkansas has expressed my conviction on this particular legislation. I should like to see some of these errors corrected; but I should not want to vote, nor shall I vote, for any amendment that virtually repeals the Economy Act. I should be glad to accept the amendment the Senator from Arkansas is proposing.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I thank the Senator from Ohio for his interruption and statement. I do not know how the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] considered this matter. I know that he has given thought to the subject. Others have done so, and the arrangement which will be effected by the legislation we shall probably pass here will in itself cause some measure of difficulty in its application; but in our anxiety to respond to the pressure, which admittedly is very great, which comes from powerful organizations as well as from individuals with whom we are in sympathy, let me suggest that we do not undo all that has been done in an effort to readjust veteran expenditures so as to be fair to the veterans and to the Treasury and the taxpayers of the United States.

I know it is easily said that nothing the Congress can do is too liberal for the men who sustained our cause when civilization hung trembling in the balance. By describing their sufferings and their sorrows, one can stimulate and quicken a sense of sympathy in connection with their appeals. I wish to avow myself as fairly and fully responsive to proposals that are just and fair; but I think a maximum limitation of 15 percent will make the Economy Act, insofar as it relates to veteran compensation, largely ineffective. I believe that a 25-percent maximum is a fair compromise. Evidently the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CUTTING] thought that. I am willing, in compliance with the suggestion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], to have a vote on the insertion of 25 percent instead of 15.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Do I understand that the Senator's pending amendment has no relationship whatever to Spanish War claims? Is it confined exclusively to World War claims?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; that is my understanding.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Would the Senator reject the suggestion submitted by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY], if we could agree upon the 25-percent limitation, to extend it also into the Spanish-American field?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I think there is much force in the suggestion made by the Senator from Oregon and by the Senator from Texas, but it occurred to me that perhaps that could be disposed of in a separate amendment.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I think perhaps we could rather readily agree upon the formula if the two could be put together.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. LONG. I think there is a separate amendment coming on the Spanish-American War veterans anyway.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I believe it would be better to deal with the Spanish-War veterans separately, although it might require more time to do that; and I am anxious to conserve time, as is also the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY].

Mr. President, believing that 25 percent is a fair compromise, I ask the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] if they do not feel that they are in a position to accept that suggestion?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Of course, I appreciate the position of the Senator from Arkansas, and the sincerity of his desire in this matter; but I have been fighting for a provision that the reduction should not be in excess of 15 percent. I have given my reasons for that. My amendment does not interfere with reclassification. If the condition of the veteran has changed, the officials have a right to reclassify him. That within itself might bring down the compensation more than 15 percent; but I do provide in my amendment that the burden of proof shall be upon the Government when it attacks a man's claim which has previously been approved by the Board. I think we ought to limit the reduction to 15 percent.

I cannot agree with the Senator from Arkansas that that is destructive of the Economy Act. There are many other provisions of that act. The amendment gives them a good deal of latitude. I do not believe that the compensation ought to be reduced over 15 percent, so I do not like to vote to reduce it more than that.

I am sorry I do not feel that I could agree to that for the purpose of having a vote on it in the Senate.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield to the Senator from New Mexico.

Mr. CUTTING. In view of the fact that the Senator from Arkansas has made the statement that I must have thought that 25 percent was a fair reduction or I would not have put that in my amendment, I think, perhaps, he will pardon me if I express, as briefly as possible, my exact purpose in offering that amendment.

As the Senator from Arkansas will realize, legislation is a matter of compromise between varying views. I offered that amendment hastily the other day in order to serve notice, in accordance with the rules of the Senate, that I was going to make a motion to suspend the rules. I offered it after hurried consultation with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. CLARK], who now occupies the chair. I thought probably that was the maximum that the Senate would agree to accept. I did not think that the limitation of 25 percent was a fair limitation. I much prefer the limitation of 15 percent. I should much prefer, Mr. President, no reduction at all. I am one of the people who do not believe that there was a single fair line in the so-called "Economy Act." I believe it was the most infamous act ever passed by the Congress of the United States. I believe it ought to be repealed from top to bottom. When I offered the amendment, however, I was merely trying to get what I thought the Congress would be willing to accept; and I do not wish to be quoted as stating or implying that that was a fair measure of justice to the disabled veterans.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I have not tried to analyze the mental processes of the Senator from New Mexico. As stated a few moments ago, I did assume that he thought 25 percent was a fair compromise, or he would not have committed himself to it by offering it. It is rather an anomalous situation that the Senator so completely repudiates his own proposal; but that is a matter that addresses itself to his own discretion. It seems to me that 25-percent maximum is a fair compromise; but I assume from what has been said that it will be necessary to take a vote on the matter.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I wish to attract the attention of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] and the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] in view of the colloquy between them respecting the omission of the Spanish-American War soldier. The eminent Senator from Arkansas correctly ascribes what might result from that, namely, that it might produce a class of claims where there was not an immediate connection between the illness and the service, known as the "service-connected disability".

I take the liberty of calling to the attention of both Senators to whom I refer the fact that as to the Spanish-American veterans we take into consideration the fact that the service of the soldiers was in the Tropics. The very service itself was disease. When the soldiers returned, it took a year before that disease took on a form which made them utterly incapable of self-support. Therefore, they cannot come within the law which applies to World War soldiers, and there was no law at the time existing such as we have now, and since eminent Senators have no desire to omit them, but, on the contrary, desire to include them, might we not now call attention to the fact that the connected liability of the service which applies to the World War cannot make its application to the Spanish-American War veteran, but that he ought to be included in the pending amendment, upon the theory that his service itself, in the land where it was given, with the natural result that would follow from it, makes the liability connection?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, that was precisely my idea. I entirely agree with the Senator, and my only thought was that perhaps we could combine all forces and put the 25-percent limitation in, and vote upon one motion, both upon the theory of the Senator from Arkansas and the theory of the Senator from Illinois, to which I heartily subscribe.

Mr. LEWIS. I was calling the attention of the Senator from Arkansas to the fact—knowing how pressed he was—that he probably had not had his attention called to why the Spanish-American War veteran could be included here without a violation of the general law.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, of course the Spanish-American War pensions are on a different basis from those of the World War veterans, and, in my opinion, it would be quite difficult to incorporate in the bill on the floor a provision which would be satisfactory in regard to the Spanish War veterans. I will move an amendment to the text of the Trammell amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has already offered one amendment. Does he withdraw that?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not now propose the substitute. I offer now the original amendment I proposed: On line 8, to strike out "15" and to insert "25."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arkansas offers an amendment, which the clerk will report.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, of course it is not in order to amend the Senator's substitute, because that would be an amendment in the third degree, unless the Senator would modify his amendment to include my amendment, which would take care of the veterans past the age of 62, which amendment I had printed and offered. I may say to the Senator that I want to modify my own amendment to include the regulation, which I think is entirely proper, namely, that this shall not apply when any veteran gets a thousand dollars if he is a single man, or $2,500 if he is married or has dependents.

Mr. STEIWER. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. STEIWER. Am I not right in my understanding that the Senator from Arkansas did not offer his substitute, but merely offered an amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is correct.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. As the Chair understands the matter, the Senator from Arkansas had his substitute read for the information of the Senate, and has not yet offered the substitute.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I may offer it later. If I may have the opportunity, while the Senate proceeds with its discussion of the matter, to consider the amendment of the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL] having relationship to Spanish War veterans, I may revise the substitute so as to include that amendment, in compliance with suggestions which have been made. I yield the floor for the present.

Mr. TRAMMELL. A parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The question now is on the amendment which I proposed, providing for a reduction not to exceed 15 percent. The Senator from Arkansas proposes to increase that figure and make it 25 percent, so that it would be 25 percent instead of 15 percent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment of the Senator from Arkansas is to strike out the numeral "15" and insert in lieu thereof the numeral "25."

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, inasmuch as considerably more than two thirds of the Senate has already voted to suspend the rules to vote on the 15-percent reduction, I hope there will be no change in this amendment. I would feel better if we reduced salaries 25 percent and the compensation of wounded soldiers 15 percent than to reduce salaries of $10,000 employees only 15 percent and reduce the soldiers' compensation 25 percent. I ask for the yeas and nays on this.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] to the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL]. The yeas and nays have been demanded. Is the demand sufficiently seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. McADOO (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE], who is not present. I do not know how that Senator would vote, and I therefore withhold my vote. If I could vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. PATTERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER]. I understand that if he were present he would vote "yea." If I felt free to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. LEWIS (when Mr. SMITH's name was called). I announce the absence of the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] on official business, and ask that this announcement stand for the day.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HEBERT. I desire to announce a general pair between the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY]. I am informed that if the Senator from Delaware were present he would vote "nay" on this question.

I also desire to announce that the Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] is necessarily absent. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] is absent attending a committee meeting. If present, he would vote "yea."

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] has a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS].

I wish to announce the absence on official business of the following Senators: Mr. ASHURST, Mr. BULOW, Mrs. CARAWAY, Mr. GEORGE, Mr. GORE, Mr. HARRISON, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. WAGNER, and Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I have not voted because I have a pair with the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS]. I am informed that it has been announced that if present the Senator from Delaware would vote "nay" on this question. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 25, nays 51, as follows:

YEAS—25

So the amendment of Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas to Mr. TRAMMELL's amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I offer an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas offers an amendment in the nature of a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Florida, which the clerk will report.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lieu of the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL] it is proposed to insert the following:

Notwithstanding any of the provisions of the act approved March 20, 1933, entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government," in no event shall World War service-connected disability compensation of any veteran or the pension of any veteran of a war prior to the World War be reduced more than 25 percent of the rate being received prior to March 15, 1933, subject to regulations as to payments to unmarried persons with incomes exceeding $1,000 or to married persons or to persons with minor children whose annual income exceeds $2,500.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, this amendment, as I understand, purports to do what the Senator from Arkansas sought to do by his amendment in the case of all veterans, except those of the Spanish-American War, and to limit the reduction that may be made to 25 percent. If I understand correctly, what the Senator is proposing to do is to provide a substitute that would prohibit a reduction of more than 25 percent being made in the case of all veterans?

Mr. CONNALLY. For service-connected disabilities.

Mr. LONG. For service-connected disabilities.

Mr. President, we have, apparently, by an overwhelming vote, reached the conclusion that we will not permit a reduction below 15 percent in World War veterans' compensation, and we expect that an amendment will be offered providing the same thing for the veterans of the Spanish-American War.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is in the amendment I have offered.

Mr. LONG. I know; but we do not want to vote to permit a reduction of 25 percent. I think we would be in sympathy with the Senator if he would make it 15 percent. The Senate is pretty well on record, since it did not consider it wise to reduce its own salaries by more than 15 percent, that it cannot afford to cut the men who were wounded in the Army more than that amount. That seems to be the position of the Senate. So I was hoping the Senator from Texas might withhold his amendment and support a later amendment, which is going to be offered, to do exactly the same thing for the Spanish-American War veterans that we hope to do for the World War veterans by the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

I do not know just what the substitute proposed by the Senator from Oregon proposes. As I understand, it has not as yet been offered. May I ask the Senator from Oregon if the amendment in the nature of a substitute which he intends to propose covers only World War veterans or does it cover the case of soldiers who served in the Spanish-American War and in the Philippines?

Mr. STEIWER. It covers all service-connected disabilities of veterans of all wars, whether directly connected or presumptively connected; that is to say, so far as we have discussed the compensation of World War and the Spanish-American War veterans; but there is one class of Spanish-American War veterans not covered by the proposal which I had read a little while ago, and that is those Spanish-American War veterans whose disabilities are not service connected.

Mr. CONNALLY obtained the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. May we again have read the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Texas? I was confused from the way in which it was read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will again read the amendment in the nature of a substitute offered by the Senator from Texas.

The CHIEF CLERK. In lieu of the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida it is proposed to insert the following:

Notwithstanding any of the provisions of the act approved March 20, 1933, entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", in no event shall World War service-connected disability compensation of any veteran or the pension of any veteran of a war prior to the World War be reduced more than 25 percent of the rate being received prior to March 15, 1933, subject to regulations as to payments to unmarried persons with incomes exceeding $1,000 or to married persons or to persons with minor children whose annual income exceeds $2,500.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to get results rather than to make a gesture. The 15-percent amendment of the Senator from Florida for which Senators are contending will never get results. I believe I speak advisedly when I say that in the final analysis—it may get the result here today; it may get the notice of the newspapers—but when all is over and the smoke of battle is cleared, the veterans will not get it. I had rather vote for an amendment preventing a cut of more than 25 percent and have it become law so that the veterans may get 75 percent of their old rate, than to read a newspaper story to the effect that I voted not to cut the veterans' compensation below 15 percent, and then not let the veterans get anything.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. CUTTING. I agree with the Senator in everything he has said; but why does he assume that it is impossible to limit the cut to 15 percent and possible to restrict it to 25 percent?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator, I hope, is a practical statesman, and we know that this amendment has got to go over several hurdles before it becomes a law. It has to go back to the other House; after it shall have been acted upon there it has got to go to the White House; after it goes to the White House it will probably be referred to the Veterans' Bureau; and the Senator knows what tremendous influence the advice of that Bureau will have upon the final action upon this bill. I have just as great sympathy as has any Senator upon this floor for the disabled service-connected veterans, but they will be glad to have an act limiting their cut to 25 percent; they will be happy to receive it. Why not let us be practical? Why not let us do something that we can hope to accomplish, rather than simply to spend a lot of time in making gestures that may not accomplish the result?

What does my amendment provide? My amendment provides that in the administration of the veterans' law, notwithstanding any provision of the National Economy Act, veterans having service-connected disability compensation—not the men whose disabilities are non-service-connected, but the service-connected disability cases—shall not be cut more than 25 per cent. It further provides that in the case of Spanish-American War veterans, not simply those above the age of 62, but all Spanish-American War veterans who were on the rolls, who were adjudged by the Government to have been disabled, who were adjudged by the Government to have been entitled to a pension, shall under this bill, if it shall become a law, not be reduced more than 25 percent. It is putting them upon the same plane with the World War veterans.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. Not all the Spanish-American War veterans drawing pensions have service-connected disabilities.

Mr. CONNALLY. No; I shall say to the Senator that some of them are not service connected, because in the old days there was no difference, under the law, between a service-connected disability and a non-service-connected disability. Those veterans whose cases have been settled, and who are lawfully on the rolls under the old law, would be left there and could not be cut more than 25 percent. They have all been adjudged to be worthy cases; the pensioners have all been adjudged to have been disabled. The records are not now available; and there is not one Spanish-American War veteran in a hundred who if he had today to prove service connection for his disability could do it.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield further to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. The Spanish-American War veterans with service-connected disabilities represent 12½ percent of the total number; those who cannot prove service connection represent 87½ percent.

Mr. CONNALLY. Exactly.

Mr. HATFIELD. How many of the 87½ percent would the amendment of the Senator from Texas take care of?

Mr. CONNALLY. It would take care of all of them. If they were on the rolls and had been adjudged to have been entitled to pension, they would stay on the rolls and the cut could not be over 25 percent.

Let me suggest to the Senator from West Virginia that most of the Spanish-American War veterans are getting old.

Old-age pensions are now being advocated. Here is a veteran who has become old; he is disabled, and the Government has determined that he was disabled. In his declining years, why cut him off simply because after more than 30 years he cannot go back and get the records of his service in the Spanish-American War to prove that his disability was caused by his service in that war?

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield further?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas further yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall yield in just a moment.

Under the pension laws when these men went on the rolls there was no requirement of the law that a disability be service connected. Consequently those soldiers made no effort to service connect their disability; then it was not required. Now, years and years afterward, when the records are not available, to require such a soldier to do something which he ought, perhaps, have been required to do away back yonder, would be unjust and unfair. Now I yield to the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. HATFIELD. Not only is the Spanish-American War soldier growing old but he became diseased because of the exposure to typhoid fever and dysentery, the seeds of which still remain in his body, and in many instances are only manifesting themselves at the present time in the period of his old age.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator is exactly right. Those who served under the Philippine's scorching sun or in the swamps of Cuba could not go up to the medical office the day they contracted an infection and say, "Doctor, I am service-connected disabled." Years afterward, in time of peace after they came back home and were integrated into the civilian population of the country, the germs of the disease and the seeds of illness sowed in their bodies under the Tropics and in the swamps began to germinate and propagate and develop in that soldier. The Congress passed no Spanish-American War pension act until 22 years after that war, and when the Congress did pass such an act, it did not require that the soldiers prove service connection, but the Government said, "Here is a veteran of 20 years and more ago; today he is physically disabled so that he cannot perform manual labor, and the Government, out of its bounty, will award him a slight pension." Now, years after his case was proven, years afterward, when the proofs are no longer available, it is unjust for a great and generous Government to insist that that veteran shall go back to the bread line unless he can resurrect some medical records, when there were no medical records.

Senators will remember in the Spanish-American War how inadequate were the hospital facilities; they will remember how poor the medical service was; they will remember how inefficient was the administrative machinery of that war; and it is now physically impossible for those veterans to obtain proof of the service connection of their disabilities.

Let me appeal to Senators. There will be many amendments offered here. This is one amendment upon which we can all stand. This is one amendment which will get results. This is one amendment that will take care of the World War veterans and also will take care of the Spanish-American War veterans. If Senators want to get results, if they want to do something substantial for the World War veterans, accept this 25 percent cut and do not insist upon only 15 percent, which cannot ever be attained.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the Senator stated that his amendment provides for a cut of 25 percent.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is the limitation.

Mr. FLETCHER. Then it does not provide that a cut must be made?

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, no. The Senator from Florida is right. He makes a very pertinent observation. The amendment does not automatically make the cut. The amendment is a limitation upon the power of the President and the Veterans' Administration and provides that they shall not make a cut of more than 25 percent.

Mr. LEWIS. Not that there shall be a cut, but if there is a cut it shall not be in excess of 25 percent.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Illinois, with his usual perspicacity and alertness, calls my attention to the fact that the effect of the amendment is not to require a cut, but if there is to be a cut it shall not exceed 25 percent. I thank the Senator from Illinois for his illuminating suggestion.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. I wish to inquire if the Senator's amendment now pending provides for the continuance of pensions to widows and dependents?

Mr. CONNALLY. It does; to veterans or their widows or dependents. It expressly so provides.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I should like to ask the Senator for an interpretation of his own language. Section 18 of the Economy Act makes a specific 10 percent reduction in Civil War pensions. Would the language of the Senator's amendment go back to the Civil War?

Mr. CONNALLY. It would not. My amendment simply provides the veterans of prior wars shall not be cut more than 25 percent. It would not in any wise refer to those cuts, because they are specific. It would not repeal that section. It is not my purpose to repeal that section.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator from Texas what effect this would have on the pensions of Spanish-American War veterans?

Mr. CONNALLY. Not exceeding 25 percent cut.

Mr. McKELLAR. But how much in money would they be affected? What do they now get under the regulations?

Mr. CONNALLY. Under the maximum they get $60, and then $45, and then $35, and then $25. Those are the four classifications. The maximum would be $60 less 25 percent, which would be $45; then $45 less 25 percent, and so on down.

Mr. McKELLAR. That is, if the amendment is adopted?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes.

Mr. McKELLAR. What would they get under the present regulations?

Mr. CONNALLY. Under present regulations more than half of them go off the rolls entirely and most of the others get only $6.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course that is indefensible. It seems to me we ought to do justice by the Spanish-American War veterans.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. FESS. As I understand the Senator's amendment, the maximum reduction is 25 percent. If there are serious cases, such as have been presented to us in the last 2 days, they need not be reduced at all?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator is correct.

Mr. FESS. Or they may be reduced along the line from zero to 25 percent?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator is correct. Under my amendment no one need be reduced at all unless the President and the Veterans' Administration decide to reduce him. If they do reduce him, he is to be reduced not exceeding 25 percent.

Let me appeal to Senators who are supporting the 15-percent cut to vote for this substitute of mine. It is well considered. On March 15, 1933, when the economy bill was pending, I offered substantially this pending amendment, and had it been adopted then we should not have had the chaos and cruel injustices that have arisen in prospect under the regulations of the Veterans' Administration.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. I am very much in sympathy with what the Senator is saying. I supported his amendment originally when offered to the Economy Act. I would like to inquire if the 25-percent limitation applies to direct service-connected cases and to presumptive cases or only to the direct service-connected cases?

Mr. CONNALLY. The language is "service-connected cases." I am not prepared to say how that language would be construed. Even though it applies only to direct service-connected cases, it is so much better than what we have, it is so much metter than what we are going to get unless we unite on some amendment, that I hope the Senator will support the amendment in its present form. The presumptive cases can be worked out by the Veterans' Bureau, we hope in a liberal spirit; but let us not divide our counsel; let us not break up our ranks. Here is a chance to put this amendment over, and if Senators will not insist on the 15-percent cut only, we shall accomplish something; but if some of us vote for 15 percent and some vote for 25 percent, we may finally adopt the 15-percent cut, and that is the last we will probably ever hear of it.

Mr. RUSSELL. I want to say to the Senator from Texas that I am going to support his amendment regardless of the final form it takes. I think it is a logical solution of the entire matter. But I wonder if the Senator from Texas would not modify his amendment by inserting the word "direct"? In order to avoid any possibility of confusion, I wonder if the Senator would not accept a modification inserting the word "direct"?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; I will accept that modification. Let it read "direct service-connected." I know the Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] is a sincere friend of the veterans, since he has been State commander of the American Legion of Georgia.

Mr. President, I have said all I want to say on the subject, but I do want to impress Senators with the seriousness of the situation. The time is here now to act, to act together; and if we do, we shall put this over. But if we divide over 15 percent and 25 percent, we may improve our own particular political fortunes, but we are going to harm the veterans whom we are trying to aid.

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I want to make this suggestion to the Senator from Texas. It was made to me a moment ago by another Senator. The sentiment that exists in the Congress now against the Veterans' Administration and its regulations is due to the fact that those who wrote the regulations went crazy, figuratively speaking. They went beyond all reason in their reductions. We are likely here, in trying to adopt the 15-percent reduction only, to lose the support of the country and lose the very thing we are trying to accomplish. I believe the country will look upon a 25-percent reduction as a decent reduction. I think the veterans will accept it as a decent reduction, and I think if that provision is put in the bill it will stand. If we make a 15-percent reduction and have a Presidential veto, I do not know what will happen, and no one else knows what will happen.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator is right. The country will support us if we make a 25-percent reduction. The veterans will be happy to accept that sort of an amendment. If we insist on cutting off only a small amount and the President should veto the bill, the country will rally to the support of the President and will condemn the Congress for undertaking to antagonize his policy.

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Rhode Island?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. HEBERT. I want to propound this inquiry to the Senator from Texas. Has he agreed to the suggestion of the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. RUSSELL] to make this apply to direct service-connected disabilities?

Mr. CONNALLY. Yes; I agreed to that.

Mr. HEBERT. Does not the Senator think that will restrict his amendment very materially?

Mr. CONNALLY. It will, but I accepted the modification in deference to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HEBERT. Moreover, will it not be more difficult in many cases to prove direct service connection?

Mr. CONNALLY. There are thousands of those cases that are on record as direct service-connected.

Mr. HEBERT. But there are thousands that are not, and it would be impossible for the veterans to prove direct service connection. It would be doing an injustice to those men.

Mr. CONNALLY. Will the Senator from Rhode Island support the amendment if that word is eliminated?

Mr. HEBERT. Yes; I will support the amendment if that change is made.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, in making the suggestion to the Senator from Texas I made the statement that I would support his amendment whether this word is added or not.

Mr. CONNALLY. In view of the very practical consideration now appearing to the Senator from Texas, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the modification and leave the amendment in its original form.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Texas may modify his amendment as he desires.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. I desire to call the Senator's attention to his amendment. I merely want to call attention to the fact that the amendment as now offered provides only for the compensation of any veteran or the pension of any veteran of a war prior to the World War.

Mr. CONNALLY. In another draft it covered widows and dependents, and I ask unanimous consent to modify the amendment to include widows of veterans and their dependents.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has a right to modify his own amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall modify it in that manner.

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. McGILL. I should like to ask the Senator from Texas a question. The amendment offered by the Senator from Texas contains the following provision:

> Subject to regulation as to payment to unmarried persons with incomes exceeding $1,000 or to a married person or person with minor children whose income exceeds $2,500.

I should like to inquire of the Senator from Texas who is to ascertain those facts in order to enforce the regulation?

Mr. CONNALLY. The Veterans' Bureau promulgated the regulations and, of course, they would be charged with the administration of them.

Mr. McGILL. Will they not be required to keep books on practically every veteran or every widow of a veteran in this country?

Mr. CONNALLY. Oh, no. I am sure they could require a return from a veteran just as we require a return with reference to incomes for the purpose of income taxes. It would be simple. They could require a sworn statement from the veteran which would be accepted in the absence of proof of fraud or some other improper motive. That would not be a difficult matter.

Let me say to the Senator from Kansas that I am including that provision in the amendment not because I approve it but because those are the regulations, and I want to go along with the Veterans' Administration just as far as I can. If a single man has $1,000 independent income, I am willing for him to forego his pension if by so doing we can get a pension for the veteran who has no income at all and who is disabled.

If a married man has an income of $2,500 a year, I am willing that he shall lose his pension if by losing it we are able to get a pension for a disabled comrade who has no income, and is physically disabled and incapable of earning a livelihood.

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield just a moment further, suppose a single man receives a compensation of $900 a year, but does not quite receive $1,000. His compensation or pension could not be reduced more than 25 percent.

Mr. CONNALLY. That is true.

Mr. McGILL. In other words, it would be advantageous to him to earn a little less than $1,000 annually.

Mr. CONNALLY. I shall say to the Senator that that is a difficulty we shall encounter in any administration of the law. I am adopting that simply as a practical proposition, not to encounter any more opposition than is unavoidable from the administration and from the Veterans' Bureau. I want results. I want this amendment adopted, and I believe that in its present form it can be adopted; but if we mutilate it, we shall not get it adopted.

Mr. McGILL. Mr. President, I feel that the amendment is far more impracticable with the provision in it to which I have called attention than it would be with the provision eliminated.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I wish to say a few words with regard to the amendment I have proposed. I desire first to suggest that we add, at the conclusion of that amendment for which the substitute has been offered, the following:

Provided, That Spanish-American War veterans shall not be required to make proof of service-connected disability.

I do that to meet the suggestion made by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. Of course, the President, in his instructions—at least I presume they are instructions, because they are carried forward in the regulation—had advised that there should be a presumption of service-connected disability in Spanish-American War cases. However, in practical operation the instructions have not been carried out in just that way. I propose to modify my amendment as I have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Florida modifies his amendment. The question is on the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, proposed by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] for the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire to say a few words on that subject.

Throughout my career in this body I have observed Senators who felt that a situation was not going just as they preferred to have it go, getting up on this floor and trying to intimidate Senators into voting as they wished to have them vote by threats of what would happen to the measure if it was not as they willed it to be.

That is true in this instance of the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY]. Of course, it is a great pity that nothing can go through here in regard to legislation to help the veterans unless it meets the entire approval of my good friend from Texas. I do not know where he gets his information that a measure which provides not exceeding 15-percent reduction cannot ever become a law, but a measure which provides 25-percent reduction he thinks will become a law. I have heard statements of that kind made on this floor many times. I think the Senator from Texas is a good friend of the veterans; but I do not understand why the Senator has not actively supported and tried to foster in this body a measure or amendments which provided for a 25- or 30-percent decrease of salaries to civilian employees who were drawing salaries of ten or fifteen thousand dollars per annum, and now says that we ought to amend the law so that we can reduce the veterans 25 percent.

I want to be consistent. My amendment for a graduated reduction in governmental salaries failed. I believe we should have reduced the big salaries in a larger percentage; but if this amendment, in the form in which the Senator from Texas has sent it to the desk, will meet with the approbation of the Veterans' Bureau, the other would just as well meet the approbation of the Veterans' Bureau.

As far as I am concerned, I am getting tired of and disgusted with the bureaucratic control of Congress by the Veterans' Bureau or any other bureau. Some people want to allow them to dictate everything. Just as man to man I have a respect, of course, for those gentlemen up there. I would have had a great deal higher respect for some of them, however, if it had not been for the travesties of justice and of good ethics involved in their maintaining at big salaries a number of Army officers who were drawing large retirement pay. When it came to those people it was all right, in their estimation, to have no reduction of their compensation through the Veterans' Bureau. We know of the disgrace and the travesty which arose in the investigation of the Veterans' Bureau here a few years ago. I do not remember the figures; but, to take a typical case, an officer is on retirement pay at about $6,000 a year. He goes into the Veterans' Bureau, and they pay him $8,000 or $10,000 a year in addition to his retirement pay. So I do not rely too much upon the judgment of people of that conception of public duty.

I believe almost every Senator here knows that the attitude of the Veterans' Bureau and the Director of the Budget has not been generous and sympathetic toward the veteran. It was, however, generous and sympathetic toward the retired officer with his $6,000 or $7,000 of retirement pay to the extent that they gave him a salary of $8,000 or $10,000 additional.

When I go to some source from which to get information for my guidance, I shall not seek that information and guidance from the Veterans' Bureau. Their record does not justify me in doing so. The whole cause of this discussion, the whole reason that we have before us the very problem which is now confronting us, is not on account of any Member of the Senate or the House of Representatives that I know anything about. It is on account of the abuses of the Veterans' Bureau and the Director of the Budget, who cooperated with them in making these unreasonable regulations and these ridiculous and outrageous reductions in compensation.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. LONG. As I understand the Senator from Texas, if the Veterans' Bureau does not want us to do anything, it is not going to do any good to do it anyway. Why not just pass a little resolution here and let us adjourn over the week-end and let the Veterans' Bureau sit down here and write the thing up? That would be a practical way of getting at it, instead of spending a lot of time and money, as we are doing now.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield; but I do not want Senators to make speeches in my time.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator yielded to the Senator from Louisiana to make some remarks about the Senator from Texas.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield to the Senator from Texas.

Mr. CONNALLY. No; Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana did not understand the Senator from Texas to say anything of the kind, or to entertain any suspicion that he has to get the consent of the Veterans' Bureau or anybody else. The Senator from Louisiana seems to labor under the delusion that nothing can happen here unless he consents to it; and his subconscious mind probably drew some deduction that the Senator from Texas was operating in the reverse in some sort of fashion.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. LONG. The RECORD will show that the Senator from Texas took up 30 minutes' time not only saying in exact words but saying in substance also that he was going to give us a bill that the Veterans' Bureau would allow us to have. That is what the distinguished Senator from Texas said; and he has nodded "yes" to what I have just said.

In line with what the distinguished Senator has just said, I do not want my friend from Florida and others of us to be laboring here in vain. Let us just send this thing down to the Veterans' Bureau; and if they do not want to come up here, let them send us word, or let them come up here and write the thing out. Why not admit that we are not running the Senate any more; that we are running under the squint-eyed, two-bit, 2-by-4 Veterans' Bureau skinflint politicians that have been brought in here to run us? [Laughter in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair must admonish the occupants of the galleries that any demonstrations of approval or disapproval of the proceedings on the floor are strictly prohibited by the rules of the Senate.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, the Senator from Louisiana, in saying "we", evidently employs the editorial "we."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield for a question. I do not want to yield for any length of time, because I want to get through; but if it is for a question, all right. I do not yield for a speech.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Will the Senator inform us how many veterans there are on the rolls whose disabilities are directly connected with service, so far as he knows?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do not know. I have not looked into that.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Is there anyone here who can tell us?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I do not know whether anyone here has those data or not. I think the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] did have some data upon that subject, but I do not know whether they show that or not.

Mr. President, I do not want to be alarmed and I do not want to be scared off the track by any suggestion that if the legislation is not for a 25-percent reduction there is no probability of its bringing practical results. I think Congress is in a position where it should be consistent; and we should not attempt to reduce the compensation of these service-connected veterans any more than we have reduced our own compensation. I have not liked to talk about that. I have supported a reduction of as much as 25 percent in our own salaries; but a majority have not done that, either in the House or in the Senate.

When I go back home, when I face the veterans—these heroes, as I regard them, these valiant men who responded to their country's call without qualifications and without limitations when they were called—I do not know how to answer them when some of them in an audience to which I am speaking say, "Well, you fellows up there in Congress would not cut your own salaries over 15 percent. Why did you want to have a veteran's compensation or pension reduced as much as 25 percent? They tell me that up there in the United States Senate this question confronted you directly; that you could either save us from a reduction of not exceeding 15 percent, or you could see fit to raise it up to where they could reduce us 25 percent. Why did you support the 25-percent reduction for us when you had refused to support an amendment proposed by certain Senators in a bill proposed by another certain Senator to make a reduction exceeding 15 percent in your own salary?"

I do not like to refer to anything about the Senate in this discussion; but if we are going to take such an inconsistent attitude, I know and I forecast just how the public will feel about it.

Senators talk about an aroused public sentiment against the Economy Act because justice is not done the veterans of this country. There will be—and there is brewing today—an aroused public sentiment against the Congress of the United States because they do not reduce in a more substantial percentage these big salaries of ten, fifteen, eighteen, and in some instances thirty-five thousand dollars. That sentiment is already aroused so far as the public is concerned.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Florida proposed an amendment to his amendment with the view, I suppose, of including the Spanish War veterans.

Mr. TRAMMELL. That was the idea—to remove the necessity of proof. I did that to perfect my amendment in order to meet the situation as contended for by the Senator from Texas and some other Senators.

Mr. BORAH. The question with me is, Does the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida include as many soldiers as the amendment of the Senator from Texas?

Mr. TRAMMELL. The amendment is as follows:

Provided, That Spanish-American War veterans shall not be required to make proof of service-connected disability.

That, of course, includes everybody who can get on the roll under the Senator's amendment or under this amendment.

I do not see that there would be any difference in the number that would be entitled to compensation under the provisions of the two amendments. The only thing is I would protect these veterans against a reduction exceeding 15 percent. When a review is attempted by the Veterans' Bureau I would place the burden of proof upon the Government. The Senator from Texas does not do this. The Senator from Texas would allow their compensation to be reduced up to 25 percent. The Senator from Texas said otherwise, but I rather think his construction of his own amendment is wrong. He says that the wording of his amendment does not open the door for a reduction up to 25 percent against Civil War veterans. It does say that veterans of all wars prior to the World War shall be subject to a reduction of as much as 25 percent. It says, notwithstanding the provision of the title being amended, that there is authority given for a reduction up to 25 percent as to the veterans of all wars prior to the World War.

The original Economy Act, title I, dealing with the question of compensation of soldiers, and so forth, specifically provides that there shall not be a reduction in excess of 10 percent in the case of Civil War veterans. As I construe it, the amendment of the Senator from Texas unquestionably repeals the limitation on the amount of reduction in the original act for Civil War veterans, and opens the door for a reduction of as much as 25 percent against the Civil War veterans. It applies to all veterans of wars prior to the World War. There are better lawyers here than myself, but I do not think I am mistaken in my construction of the Senator's provision as to Civil War veterans. I think it would unquestionably repeal the provision that a Civil War veteran's pension shall not be reduced more than 10 percent, and it would give the administration authority to reduce their pensions 25 percent.

Mr. President, I have occupied much time on this matter because I have taken an intense interest in it. I have been working hard on it for 3 days in order that I might try to do my little mite in behalf of the men of this country who I believe deserve it, believing that their Nation owes them a debt of gratitude, and that they should be defended, if necessary, by Representatives and by Senators against the attack, cruel as it has been, which has been directed at them by the Veterans' Administration, or whoever it is who has promulgated these regulations, the application of which, in many instances, has been cruel and brutal.

I do not want to rely on the Veterans' Bureau particularly to make corrections. To my mind they have already displayed heartlessness; they have displayed a lack of interest in giving sympathetic treatment to our veterans; and I do not propose to have them direct what kind of legislation shall be enacted. I would come nearer opposing a 25-percent proposal if I knew it came from the Veterans' Administration instead of favoring it. I do not want to have them think they carry me around in their vest pocket, or have any of these other bureaucrats around Washington entertain such an idea. They think that as to certain Senators and Representatives, whatever they say goes, and they want to dominate and control Congress. It is time the Congress was not only asserting its independence but performing its duty as the Constitution of the country requires and the people of the country expect.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. As I understand it, the Senator has modified his amendment so that the Spanish War veterans are taken care of in the same way the World War veterans are?

Mr. TRAMMELL. They would not have to make proof of the service connection of their disabilities if they are on the roll.

Mr. COPELAND. And the cut shall not be more than 15 percent?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Not exceeding 15 percent.

Mr. COPELAND. And the Senator does not require a pauper's oath?

Mr. TRAMMELL. Oh, no. I did intend to say something about that, but I have been so intense in this matter that I thought I had already talked too long.

In my State, Mr. President, ever since I entered public life, the people and the legislative body of that State have felt a pride in paying honor to the Confederate veterans. We long since got away from the idea of making a pauper list of the Confederate veterans of the State who were given pensions. When people began to talk about a pauper list for the Confederate veterans, it was not only resented by the veterans themselves, but it was resented almost unanimously by the people of the State of Florida. We have no pauper list there, and I do not think one should be established here.

If the necessity is so acute and there is such a demand for economy and the saving of money—and I think we ought to save all possible—we can trim enough out of the very bill to which I have offered this amendment to match all we could possibly save by adopting as the policy of the Congress a pauper-role requirement to be applied to the patriots and the heroes of this country.

Mr. President, I have gone over the independent offices appropriation bill; I have read its provisions; and I say that we could eliminate, without hurting the public service, items which would afford sufficient savings to more than balance every dollar that would be saved by establishing the pauper list proposed in the amendment of the Senator from Texas.

The main question now is whether or not the Senate wants to place a greater restriction upon the rights of the veterans by allowing a decrease of 25 percent or whether they prefer to leave open the opportunity to reduce only 15 percent.

I think Senators will thoroughly remember that this question of limitation is not a new feature or departure in legislation of this character. In former legislation we fixed a limitation in regard to Civil War veterans. We fixed a limitation in regard to salary reductions in the legislation, and we fixed other limitations. Only the group of our people who served us in war, who have been the Nation's defenders, have heretofore been left without any limitation upon what reduction may be made in their compensation and pensions. That is the discrimination which I am trying to repeal and to overcome.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield again?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. The difference between these two pending matters is this, is it not? The Senator from Florida proposes that, as to certain disabilities, whether incurred in the World War or in a previous war, the Spanish War, for instance, the cut shall not exceed 15 percent, which is the cut which we imposed upon ourselves and upon employees of the Government. That is what we have in the proposal of the Senator from Florida. On the other hand, we have the proposal of the Senator from Texas, which is that there shall be a cut of 25 percent, and then, besides that, the requirement of a pauper oath. Am I correct?

Mr. TRAMMELL. That is correct.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, the Senator being a lawyer, I should like to ask him this question: Is the Veterans' Administration, under this amendment of the Senator from Texas, to decide whether or not a veteran made a thousand dollars? If so, what is to be the yardstick in determining that fact? They can say he made a thousand dollars a year before, and, therefore, that they will not put him on the roll. They can say he made $83 in the month of January, and that, therefore, they will not put him on the roll, and that will practically make the pauper's oath necessary.

There is something further about it. Even though we make the figure 10 percent, the Veterans' Administration will make it 25 percent anyway. Do not worry about that. In the administration of it they will make it 25 percent. When they come to administer the act, surrounded by all these exceptions to be included, Senators will find that far more men will be cut 25 percent than will be cut just 15 percent in the administration of the act.

Under the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas a man would have to prove that he could not make $1,000 a year. If he went out the year before and worked and made $83 a month, then he would not get any pension; but if he does not work, he will get something in the way of a pension. It would be far better to encourage these men to work all they could, rather than to hook the pauper's oath onto the legislation, in effect telling a man he has to be able to show that year in and year out he never made $1,000.

Just one more word about the Veterans' Administration. My friend the Senator from Texas says that if the Veterans' Bureau sits down on the bill the President will veto it. We have shown here this morning that we have enough votes to override a veto. We have voted already by about 60 to 20 to suspend the rules and to put this amendment over, or perhaps I overstated it a little and should have said 55 to 21 or 22 or 23.

Mr. President, that is not all. This is part of the independent offices appropriation bill, and there is not so much danger. Nor is that all. The people of this country are demanding justice for the soldiers, and I want to say this: That I do not think we ought to cut the salaries of Congressmen from $10,000 down to $8,500, because I cannot live and support a family on $8,500, and I do not believe any other Member of this body is doing it in Washington if his family lives in anything like the comfortable circumstances in which they lived back home. But I would far rather go back and face the American people and be able to say that I had voted to cut our salaries 25 percent than to cut my own salary 15 percent and cut the disabled veterans more than 15—up to as high as 25, or perhaps more than that.

Mr. President, if we feel that we are going to turn these people over to the mercies of an administration that has already proved itself to have been so merciless that Congress had to pass an act in order to undo what they have done, if, regardless of what they have done, we are going to turn them over, under such an amendment, to that kind of an administration, there is no use passing any law, anyway. We voted twice on this matter, and I am hoping that Senators will not now change their minds and make the figure 25 percent, and make a soldier take the pauper's oath and prove he had a pauper's income in order to qualify at all; but that is what the amendment of the Senator from Texas means.

I predict that if we adopt the amendment of the Senator from Texas we are going to arouse the public to a greater extent than they are aroused now, because under the exemptions and qualifications the bill makes it is not going to do the soldiers very much good. It will perhaps do them less good than what they might get without our doing anything at all. I hope we will stand by the amendment of the Senator from Florida, approval of which we have already expressed by a vote of 2 to 1, and not nullify what a good amendment is intended to accomplish.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, just one word. There was one feature I overlooked mentioning in connection with my amendment, that is, the feature which provides that when the Veterans' Administration is ready to review a case, where the man is already on the roll with service connection established, instead of requiring that poor fellow to reestablish all over again his service connection, where it is attacked by the Veterans' Administration, the burden of proof shall be upon the Government agency.

I think that is really an important feature of my amendment which is not in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I want to call to the attention of Senators the fact that not only would this amendment of the Senator from Texas require a veteran to go into court and establish his case again, and bear the burden of proof, but it would wipe out that part of the amendment of the Senator from Florida which undertakes to correct that injustice, but he has to go back all over again. There is something else. He has not only to go through the mill again, but he has to prove he is not making $1,000 or cannot inherit $1,000, and that there is no one who is going to give him $1,000, in order to get a pension.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I do not care to detain the Senate to debate this matter further, but I want to make this announcement, that I have modified the language of the proposal which I sent to the desk earlier in the afternoon to have read, so that it now provides all the protection that was provided at the time it was read, and, in addition to that, contains a provision against the reduction by more than 15 percent of the pensions of the veterans of the Spanish-American War or of the widows, orphans, children, or dependents of such pensioners.

This proposal is substantially the proposal of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], except for some changes in language. I do not care to argue it at this time. I speak of it merely for the reason that if the desire of the Senate is to vote for a provision limiting the cut to 15 percent, instead of 25 percent, it will have the opportunity to do that without voting for the substitute offered by the Senator from Texas; but in case his amendment shall be voted down, I will offer mine. Of course, if his amendment should be agreed to, mine would not be in order.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am sure every Senator has been shocked by the administration of the veterans law. I know I have been. I am not going to take the time of the Senate to recite cases beyond those I have already mentioned, but I know that Congress never intended that there should be such radical reductions as have been made in the cases of veterans who lost in combat both legs and perhaps both arms or their sight. I know that we never intended to have things like that happen. No Senator ever expected they would happen.

My feeling now, Mr. President, is that we must be very sure that we are enacting into law terms so definite that nobody called upon to administer the law can fail to do justice to the veterans. I, myself, am not satisfied with the substitute proposed by the Senator from Texas. To begin with, it is shocking to think that a pauper's oath must be taken. We have been appealed to year after year by veterans not to have such a provision in any law which we might enact. It is humiliating to the man who has fought for his country to have to take the oath that he is so poverty-stricken that his income falls below the limit proposed by the law itself.

Mr. President, the Senator from Florida has modified his amendment in such a way as to take care of the Spanish-American War veteran. As I view it, this group of veterans has been outrageously treated; and when I know that a man who is past 70 years of age, who is almost ready to die of heart disease, a man who was a major in the Spanish-American War and who was wounded in that war, whose compensation was cut down within 1 week—only last Saturday—from $50 to $8, I, myself, do not want to depend upon regulations. The Senator from Texas, in his amendment, has proposed regulations.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. OVERTON in the chair). Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. COPELAND. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. The Senator from Texas inserted that provision not because he favored it, but because he thought it would be more practicable. So far as the Senator from Texas is concerned, he is willing to modify his amendment and eliminate the clause about regulations.

Mr. COPELAND. I am glad to hear what the Senator has said. We do not want any regulation provided for.

Mr. CONNALLY. If I may do so at this time, I will now modify the amendment in that respect.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I shall vote for the Trammell amendment. Perhaps 15 percent is not the figure which should be fixed, but after we shall have finished this bill it must go to conference. There will be a real conference. This country has been aroused by the injustices and the cruelties perpetrated in the interpretation of the law which we passed last spring. In consequence of the fact that the country is aroused, the administration is aroused.

I would be among the last to believe that the great-hearted President of the United States knew anything about the cruelties imposed by these regulations; he did not know that; he cannot know everything that is going on. But the administration now knows that the Congress wants justice done to the veterans who were disabled in combat during their service.

Mr. President, we can well afford to accept the amendment of the Senator from Florida. Then if in conference it seems wise to change the figure from 15 percent to 20 percent or to 25 percent, the proposition will come back to us for our approval. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Florida, however, is clear-cut; he who runs may read; and there will be no doubt about how the veterans will be treated if it shall become a law.

Mr. President, I hope that the Connally amendment will be defeated and that the Senate may adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have been in attendance upon the Committee on Finance and the dirigible investigation, so that it has been impossible to be present during the consideration of the bill now before the Senate.

I am advised, however, that amendments have been adopted to the pending bill which will necessitate an appropriation of more than $160,000,000. This means a material modification of the program of economy which it was expected the administration would carry into effect. The Democratic administration has been receiving no little praise on account of the economies which it was believed were being effected. Democratic leaders, as well as the press of the country, have claimed that the policies inaugurated by the President would reduce governmental expenses for the next fiscal year at least $1,000,000,000. Much of the enthusiasm for President Roosevelt has grown out of the belief that he has earnestly contended for the reduction in the expenses of the Government and has suggested plans to accomplish that result.

The people of the United States were dissatisfied with the enormous expenses of the Federal Government under the last administration, and they likewise were dissatisfied with the heavy burdens of taxation which were imposed upon them by the States and their political subdivisions. It is not too much to say that there was a revolt against the heavy burdens of taxation. State legislatures were compelled to inaugurate reforms in most if not all of the branches of the State governments, and the officials in counties and municipalities and school districts, under the pressure of public opinion, were likewise forced to reduce administrative expenditures. During the past few years the burden of taxation throughout the United States has created resentments and indignations among the people until many law-abiding citizens have indulged in most violent criticisms of public officials and of the Government itself.

The triumphant election of Mr. Roosevelt was in part due to the conviction that he would inaugurate reforms in the Government and reduce its expenses. The platform of the Democratic Party which pledged a 25-percent reduction in the expenditures of the Government met with the hearty approval of the people.

I repeat when I state that the people believed the promises made in the platform; they had confidence in Mr. Roosevelt; and the various addresses which he delivered in the campaign strengthened their confidence in him. His inaugural address confirmed the high esteem in which he was held by the people, and they looked to him to inaugurate reforms and carry out economic and political policies that would lift our country from the valley of depression and restore prosperity to the people. That he has earnestly addressed himself to accomplish the promises made by the party, all must concede. His leadership has been unchallenged, and measures which he has supported have won the approval of the people. Of course no party can avoid errors, and no leader no matter how great he may be, will prove infallible. But it must be conceded that the measures adopted by the administration arrested dangerous forces which threatened the integrity of our industrial and political system. It is not too much to say that he turned the tide of disaster and converted sinister forces into instruments of progress and victory.

Speaking in a general way and without having in mind the provisions of the bill before us, I beg leave to suggest that there must be no faltering upon the part of the Democrats in carrying to fruition those measures and policies that will revive business, restore confidence, and bring concord, peace, and happiness to the people of our country.

The overwhelming victory gained by the Democrats at the last election imposes serious and solemn obligations upon the Democratic Party. History is replete with examples of great victories being turned into defeats by reason of the follies and blunders of the victors. The Democratic Party cannot assume that its great victory will carry the party forward indefinitely to succeeding successes and triumphs unless the members of the party individually and in their corporate form hold high the standard of justice and execute sound and rational policies.

The party, to commend the confidence of the people, must live up to high standards of morality and justice; it must possess courage and resoluteness; it must execute plans resting upon solid foundations; it must not be a party of opportunism or be led by every wind of doctrine which for the moment may meet with current approval.

The Democratic Party has before it a heavy responsibility. It must not depart from policies resting upon morality and justice. It must build not alone for the present but for the future. It must appreciate that society is not static, that evolutionary forces operate in the economic and political world as they find expression in the biological world.

Democracy is not a class political creed, but it is a philosophy broad enough to envelope people everywhere and to bring to them the rich fruits of progress and national and international peace and prosperity.

Recurring to the question of economy, we must not forget that for a number of years the Democrats have been denouncing the Republican Party for its unwise and unsound policies and for the unnecessary and indeed extravagant appropriations made in behalf of the Federal Government. It has been charged that the Republican Party has built up a powerful bureaucracy, increased the number of bureaus and Federal agencies, and added tens of thousands of names to the list of the Federal personnel. We insisted that taxes should be reduced, Federal expenses should be cut, and that the Budget should be balanced.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. If we had reduced our own salaries 25 percent, if we had applied the 25-percent reduction to the employees of the Government, then I would take the position the Senator takes; but when we dealt with ourselves we made a 15-percent cut, and we ought not to do more in reducing service pensions than we have done in the reduction of our own salaries.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Senators who have made that statement must know that the 15-percent reduction was a uniform reduction applicable to all, and that this amendment provides the maximum reduction which may be made even in case of one who does not need any Government aid at all, and the reductions on the average may be much less.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, the Senator from Arkansas has made a suitable reply to the interrogatory of the Senator from New York. More could be said showing its inapplicability to the bill under discussion, but I shall not be diverted from the thesis to which I was directing my attention.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KING. I yield to the Senator from Minnesota at his request.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I thank the Senator. I wish to compliment him for the fine addresses he has made in the Senate on the subject of economy. I know the Senator is a humane man. I have here a memorandum showing the reductions made in pensions to wounded soldiers of the last war, and to show what the reduction means, I will read a typical case. Gunshot wound——

Mr. KING. I do not want to yield for the Senator to make a speech. I suggest that he make the statement in his own time.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I wanted to ask the Senator if he considers that it was an extravagance to cut the compensation of the wounded veteran of whom I am about to read, in the manner in which it has been cut?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I am not discussing particular cases, nor am I contending that some proposed reductions in the claims and allowances and compensation of some veterans are just. Indeed, it is quite likely, in examining and classifying the various claims for compensation, mistakes have been made which call for correction. I think before I conclude—and I shall be very brief—that the Senator's question will have been answered, if I have not already answered it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Very well. I will not impose upon the Senator.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, as I have indicated, I have been speaking in a general way and without reference to the bill before us or the amendments which have been recently under consideration. It has been my purpose rather to direct the attention of Democratic Senators to the pledges of their party, and to impress upon both Republicans and Democrats the importance of economy in the administration of the Government. Notwithstanding the improved condition of the country during the past 2 or 3 months, there are still obstacles to overcome and thorny paths to tread.

It is no easy task to rescue a patient who has been suffering for a long period and to bring back health and strength to the afflicted one. We have been suffering for a number of years from serious maladies which have produced a most serious if not a dangerous condition. A restoration to health will not come promptly, and, as I have said, we will reach the summit only after overcoming difficulties and encountering many vicissitudes.

Notwithstanding the heavy burdens of taxation, the deficits during the past 3 years have been stupendous. The deficits for 3 years will aggregate nearly $6,000,000,000. To meet the confused situation in our country, to relieve unemployment, and to provide for the destitute will require further enormous sums. Additional borrowings will be required by the Government if a program for economic rehabilitation is carried out. Such a program, all agree, is imperatively required; and yet the credit of the country and the Government must not be impaired; its prestige must not be weakened. Reforms must be inaugurated in the Government, and every reasonable effort must be made to reduce the operating expenses of the country to the lowest possible level consistent with efficiency and imperative requirements.

Responsibility rests upon the Democrats to meet the situation. If they fail they will be subject to severe criticism and their great victory may be turned into defeat. It has been said that the expenses of the Federal and State governments and their political subdivisions impose tax burdens upon the people greater than those which the people of any other country are compelled to meet. Certain it is that between 25 and 30 percent of all the earnings of all the people of the United States during the past 3 or 4 years have been taken from them by the taxgatherers to meet governmental expenditures. These heavy burdens are obstacles in the pathway of economic recovery, and, therefore—that is the point which I am attempting to make—every reasonable effort should be made to reduce expenses and lessen the burden of taxation.

The people have been following President Roosevelt because they believed that he stood for economy and would put into execution plans that would materially improve the condition of the people, and he has received generous support in his efforts to obtain the results desired.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. KING. I yield.

Mr. CUTTING. The Senator says that the Democratic Party pledged that the expenses of the Government should be reduced 25 percent. Does the Senator consider that the Democratic Party pledged that one half of that saving should be taken out of the disabled veterans?

Mr. KING. Mr. President, as I have stated—and the Senator, of course, was not paying attention to what I said, and I cannot blame him for that——

Mr. CUTTING. I have been listening with great care to the Senator.

Mr. KING. I was not directing myself specifically to the measure under consideration or to any of the amendments which have been offered to the bill before us.

However, I do not hesitate to state that appropriations have been made to individuals who were not entitled to the same. Mr. Hoover made recommendations calling for reductions in appropriations made to veterans in various categories. The investigations which were made by committees of the House and Senate, in my opinion, revealed that there should be reductions in appropriations carried in pension and veteran appropriation bills. Some veterans were not adequately provided for, and some were receiving compensation in excess of what was fair, and others were entitled to no compensation. One of the purposes of the so-called "Economy Act" was to enable the administration to make a searching investigation of the entire matter, with a view to correcting any injustices either to the Government or to the veterans or to their families. The President is a man of broad sympathies and of exalted ideals. He desires to see that no injustice is done to anyone, and the authority conferred upon him will not be abused, but, upon the contrary, will be exercised in a manner that will meet the commendation of all patriotic and right-minded people. As I understand the fact, the President and his assistants have not yet completed their investigations under the Economy Act. They are ready to make such adjustments and such changes as will meet every situation and provide just and adequate compensation to all entitled to the same.

From what I can learn I fear that some Senators have been too impatient and have been too much inclined to criticize the administration before knowing all the facts or knowing just what the final judgment of the President and his advisors will be with respect to the matters submitted for their consideration in the economy measure heretofore passed. I feel certain that the President's final judgment upon the matter referred to will measure up to the highest standard of justice and that no one will have any reasonable ground to complain.

It is quite likely that some persons will be denied all that they demand. It has been demonstrated that some reserve officers were not entitled to the retirement privileges and emoluments which they have received. I think it is admitted that compensation and payments have been made to persons who were not justly entitled to the same. In my opinion the President will deal with this question in a sympathetic and a just manner. To deny him the opportunity to go forward and complete the task assigned to him is, in my opinion, not the wisest course to pursue. I am willing to trust the President in this matter, believing that his decision will meet the approval of all patriotic and fair-minded people. But as stated, I rose not for the purpose of discussing the bill under consideration but rather to challenge attention to the promises made by the Democratic Party and the responsibility which rests upon that party to inaugurate reforms in the administration of the Government and to bring about economies that will reduce the burdens of taxation, which bear so heavily upon the people.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, solely because of the statements made as to the cost which would result under the Connally amendment if it were adopted, I want to state that insofar as the Spanish-American War veterans are concerned it would result in an expenditure of $65,000,000 in addition to the amount provided for by the regulations as at present. As to the World War veterans, under the language of the amendment as modified by the Senator from Texas so that it now includes all presumptive cases, it would add $105,000,000. That is a total of $170,000,000 that would be added to our pension bill by the amendment.

Mr. CONNALLY. O Mr. President, the Senator does not mean that. The rolls have not yet been prepared under the new regulations.

Mr. BYRNES. It would be that much more than the estimate of the Administration based upon the regulations. I want to state that I intend to vote for the Connally amendment. I am going to do it because I believe it superior to and wiser than the Trammell amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, this is a most regrettable situation. It is unfortunate that these proceedings correcting the alleged errors in veterans' regulations should be taking place in the Senate without committee consideration or action by the Executive. It might be well to inquire why we are taking the course that we are now assuming as Democrats here in the Senate.

First of all, everybody was agreed in the beginning of the administration that there was need of rigid economy in the Federal Government and we willingly consented to give unlimited powers to the President for the purpose of reducing the expenses of Government. Among other powers delegated him was the power to change and modify the compensation and pensions of war veterans. Since the President promulgated his regulations some weeks ago it has become apparent to everybody everywhere, that there are certain unmistakable injustices in those regulations. It has been apparent for weeks even to the opponents of veterans' benefits that those regulations went too far. They are too drastic—this is generally recognized in all quarters. The Economy League, that fought bitterly for reduction in the compensation of veterans, never attempted or suggested the extreme lengths to which some of those regulations have gone.

What is the situation now confronting me and confronting you and you and you? Are we, knowing there is an injustice perpetrated, going to vote to remedy it when we have the opportunity or not? I, for one, did not propose all these amendments. I have been willing to wait until the President acted by modifying the regulations. But when Senators rise here and put the issue to me, "Are you now going to correct these injustices or are you going to wait and take another chance as to whether they will be corrected?" I say there is no other course for us to pursue except the one we are now pursuing, and that is to pass upon each of these amendments on its merits.

It is regrettable and unfortunate, and there is only one way to prevent it, because the Senate is saturated with the feeling that through these regulations an injustice or several injustices have been done the veterans. The way to accomplish the desired result is for the President to modify the regulations. That is the much better way, the safer way, the sounder way, than to try to legislate here without carefully drafting the necessary changes upon the floor of the Senate.

To be sure my good friend the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] has stated that the President intends to do it, but the answer to that is, that that is the very answer we got when we passed the Economy Act, that the President would do the just thing. He intended to do it. He has indicated that he intends to make necessary changes. The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] hit the mark the other day when he stated that was the trouble whenever we delegate authority to another; that the man to whom we delegate it does what he thinks is a just thing, but it is not necessarily the thing that is just when we weigh the consensus of opinion of 96 men. What we are confronted with now is whether, knowing there is admitted injustice, we will adjourn and go back to our constituents and hear their complaints and statements of discontent—and I repeat, the worst enemies of the veterans everywhere admit there are injustices in these regulations—or correct them in a sensible way.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I simply want to say that I do not believe the Senator from Massachusetts was in the Chamber today when I made the statement, not as to what is to be done, but the definite statement that, so far as Spanish-American War veterans are concerned who are affected by the amendment introduced by the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL], the President has definitely determined that as to those veterans there will be a fixed mimimum rate of $15, and that as to those suffering disabilities there would be fixed higher rates, not yet definitely determined upon, but to be determined in the future; that the cases of presumptives should be considered not wholly with the idea of going into each case to determine that some should remain and some should not, but to place them on a basis where they could remain and be paid some compensation on a different basis from the directly battle-wounded veterans.

Mr. WALSH. I did not hear the statement. I know the Senator has been most zealous and most desirous of bringing about modifications, and I think it is regrettable that the Senator, fighting for the position of the administration here on the floor of the Senate, should be confronted with a wave of protest resulting from the injustices which we all admit exists. Yet here and now is, apparently, our only chance to correct the injustices in the absence of a proclamation by the President before the Congress adjourns.

Mr. President, I rose simply to show what the feeling is here what it is in the country, namely, that there are injustices that ought to be corrected. But this may not be the place to correct it. The one who can correct it—the President of the United States—ought to modify the regulations and let us end this controversy, instead of having one amendment going to one extreme and another amendment going to another extreme. We have rewritten one proposed amendment at least half a dozen times, and the end is not yet, apparently. I am going to vote for it. The Senator says he is going to vote for it. Why is he going to vote for it? It is because he sees it is the only chance we have to prove that we are trying to correct these injustices in the absence of action by the Chief Executive, who issued the proclamations that changed existing benefits.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from New Mexico?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. CUTTING. Of course I accept every word the Senator from South Carolina says as being 100 percent in good faith, but may I remind the Senator who is speaking that when the bill was under consideration he himself stated on the floor of the Senate that the President would make no cut and no reduction of any appreciable amount in connection with the veteran whose compensation is based upon disability as the result of direct service. Of course the Senator was equally in good faith when he made that announcement. He was taking it from those whom he assumed would live up to the pledges they made. The point I make is, How can we accept any assurance which would prevent us from doing what is the bounden duty of the legislative body?

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the Senator from New Mexico has corroborated what I have been trying to say, that when men say injustices have been done and the opportunity is given to correct them, they will not rely upon promises of what may happen in the future. They are going to act when their action can change an injustice into an act of justice. Therefore, I say that what we ought to do is to adjourn now and come back Monday, and let the President in the meantime make the modifications that he feels and that we feel and that I am sure his advisers must feel are necessary in order to correct the errors and yet not destroy the principle of economy that we are all desirous of upholding to reasonable limits. The regulations can be modified reasonably and cautiously and intelligently, and the one person who can do it is the President by proclamation which would remove these injustices.

Am I stating what is in the interest of the administration or what is in the interest of the soldier or what is in the interest of the country, or am I simply here protesting and criticizing without offering anything constructive?

Mr. DILL. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Massachusetts yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. DILL. I want to say to the Senator that it is my understanding that the administration is unable to revise these regulations at this time, so we are told.

Mr. WALSH. I do not want to criticize the administration, but I believe they have discovered the injustices that every man on this floor has discovered and I believe they will make the necessary changes. But the Congress is impatient and will not delay.

Mr. DILL. They admit there are injustices, but they say they cannot make the changes immediately. It seems to me the Senate can well indicate here and now by this amendment that we propose that at least they shall not go above 25 percent in any of these cases. That is a fair and just and reasonable proposal indicating our view of how the Economy Act should be administered.

Mr. WALSH. Does the Senator believe, in view of what he has seen in the Chamber today, that the Senate is going to stop with this amendment?

Mr. DILL. I do not know. I rather think it will if it is adopted.

Mr. WALSH. I think, before we get through, there will be several amendments to this bill.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to make one observation?

Mr. WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. ASHURST. Being conscious, as I am sure most Senators are, of some errors and injustices in the regulations, I must say if we, Senators, realizing these errors, fail to correct them when we have the power and the opportunity to do so, how childish and puerile it would then be for us to criticize the President and the Budget Director, when we, having the power to make the corrections, fail to do so because, forsooth, it might not be convenient to us, or because of some parliamentary difficulties!

We should proceed to make needed corrections, and right the injustices and wrongs. Then, at least, we will have done our duty.

Mr. WALSH. I agree with the Senator; but does not the Senator think it would be better if the President would do it?

Mr. ASHURST. It would be well if the President would do so. I prefer that Congress should. It might be easier to leave it to the President. It might not be so irksome to us. It might not be so tedious; but let us do our duty.

Mr. WALSH. It is quite apparent that Congress is going to do it unless the Senate adjourns and the President acts before this bill is disposed of.

Mr. ASHURST. I should prefer that Congress do so, because Congress committed the wrong.

I, somehow, cannot get away from the idea that it is unsportsmanlike and unfair to grant power and then complain.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, logically carried out, that means that the Senator is going to vote for amendments that will correct the injustices called to his attention. Other Senators will do the same, and so will I.

Mr. ASHURST. I shall indeed vote for every amendment that I think tends to correct an evil or an error. I voted for the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], and I shall vote for other amendments.

The Economy Act is not sacrosanct. The Economy Act is similar to any other law. We have the right to change the same. We have the power to do so, and I reserve to myself the right to vote to change the Economy Act or any other law.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator's position is absolutely sound.

Mr. ASHURST. I endorse the able speech of the Senator from Massachusetts. He has correctly horoscoped the situation. Unless these obvious errors are corrected, it might have the effect of repealing and nullifying the whole Economy Act.

It is wise, Senators, to make timely concessions. There is no matter of pride involved here. Sometimes a timely concession will avoid the necessity of a humiliating surrender on an important point.

Mr. WALSH. I thank the Senator from Arizona.

Let us be practical. The Congress adjourns in 2 weeks. The Senator goes back to Arizona. I go back to Massachusetts. A constituent confronts you and says, "Do you think those veteran regulations were just and proper?" "No." "Why did you not correct them?" "I left it to the President."

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield——

Mr. WALSH. I yield.

Mr. ASHURST. No man is going to get me into such a cul-de-sac. I am going to vote against adjourning unless and until these abuses are corrected.

Mr. WALSH. I feel as the Senator does. Especially when the Senator has put up to him, as a Member of the Senate, an amendment correcting obvious injustices, he is going to act.

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator cannot say, "I voted against the amendment because I thought the President would do it. I surrendered my power."

Mr. ASHURST. I do not think it ought to be or will be construed by the President or by the Budget Director to be offensive to say that it is possible for them to make a mistake.

Mr. WALSH. But they may not have appreciated that Congress was rampant with a feeling that they had a duty, before they adjourned, to rectify these alleged injustices.

Mr. ASHURST. That might be true.

Mr. WALSH. That is the whole situation—that Congress is determined to use whatever weapons and means it has, on motions to suspend the rules for amendments, to do what? To embarrass the President? No; to correct what they are convinced and know and believe are injustices in the veterans' law.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. ASHURST. I should like to add one sentence. I look upon it, in one phase, just as if Congress had summed up a column of figures and had made an obvious error. Would Congress be so stiff-necked, so arrogant, as to refuse to correct the error?

Mr. WALSH. Especially if the one who set down the figures did not correct the error.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. WALSH. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. It appears from the vote here that the Congress has arrived at the conclusion that these injustices have been done, and we ought to correct them. It seems to me that when we go home and meet our veteran constituents, of whom the Senator speaks, they will ask us why we did not correct them. We are the legislative body. We are the body that called them to war. We are the body that placed them in a position where they suffered as they have suffered, and we are the body that passed the law in the first place. They will ask us, "Why did not you, as a legislator, seek to correct these things? Do not put it on the President. Assume the responsibility yourselves."

Mr. WALSH. The Senator is exactly right.

Mr. President, I do not care to say anything more except, in conclusion, that I should like to see those in charge of this legislation, and those who want harmony to exist between the majority party here and the Chief Executive, arrange between now and Monday morning for modification of these regulations in a scientific manner and not in a haphazard manner, such as may be inevitable by reason of voting on the amendments hastily prepared, not in committee but on the floor of the Senate. Without this assurance it will be the duty of many of us to vote for remedial amendments that enlarge the scope of existing regulations, even if not scientifically drafted.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I have here a list of 50 typical cases of service-connected disability that were placed in the RECORD on yesterday afternoon. Let me read for you one typical case of a soldier suffering from the following:

> Gunshot wound right thigh, right knee through and through; left leg through and through, with fracture upper part of left fibula, previously rated permanent partial, 15 percent, or $15 per month, under Public, No. 2, Seventy-third Congress, 10 percent, or $8 per month.

I want to know if there is any man here in the Senate who thinks it is extravagant to pay that man $15 a month. Is there anyone here in this Congress who takes that position—a Congress many of whose Members voted to cancel the debt to the foreign governments; a Congress many of whose Members voted for the Hoover moratorium, costing the Federal Treasury $250,000,000, for the benefit of the banks of London and New York; a Congress many of whose Members have voted by the hundreds of millions and the billions of dollars to take the money of the Federal taxpayers out of the Treasury and give it to corporations, many of which made more millions during the war when these boys were suffering in the trenches?

This is a typical case out of the 50. So far as I am concerned, I want the RECORD to show that I am in favor of economy, and I will go as far as anyone in economy; but when we come to take it out of these men that we sent into the trenches to be shot up, and who were shot up, I am in favor of no economy at all. I am absolutely opposed to cutting the compensation of any wounded veteran of the World War, or of any other war.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I hesitate to say anything about the legislation which is now under consideration, because there is very little to add to the detailed speech which the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] made the other day. In view, however, of some of the misstatements which have been made in the press, and in view of some that have been made on the floor of this Chamber, I think it is fair to submit 2 or 3 general considerations which ought to be present in the mind of every Senator before he votes on these amendments.

In the first place, what is the basis for soldiers' compensation?

Since the foundation of this country we have adopted the policy that the Government should take care of those who had been injured in its military or naval service. It is a policy which, of course, did not originate in this country. It has been adopted by every civilized nation in the world.

When, as in the World War, by congressional action we draft into the service of the United States and send abroad into the field a certain proportion of the manhood of the country, we are under an even more stringent obligation than that which applies to men who volunteered their services, taking their own chances. The Congress of the United States is directly responsible for every injury incurred by every veteran whom it drafted into the service in 1917 and 1918.

Congress was generous with these men when they came back. The people of the United States wished them to be generous; and the early legislation passed at this Capitol was legislation of a most liberal character. It was the administration of the various laws passed by Congress which came more and more into disrepute.

Instead of giving the benefit of the doubt to individual cases of veterans, as was provided in the original legislation, the Veterans' Bureau gradually adopted a policy of paring expenses, of resolving a doubt against the veteran and in favor of the Government. As a result of that policy, Congress felt obliged to amend the original act on repeated occasions to correct some manifest injustice applying to individual cases.

Each time the Congress amended the original act it took care of an individual injustice, and inevitably in many cases allowed a certain number of unworthy applicants to appear upon the rolls.

One of the amendments adopted very early in the history of this legislation was that dealing with presumptions—an amendment which has been thoroughly described today by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD], himself an eminent physician.

The reason for that legislation was that in cases of tuberculosis, of nervous disorder, of cancer, of many other diseases of similar character, it was impossible for anyone to prove his service connection, although, by a liberal interpretation of the original clause giving the service man the benefit of the doubt, he should have been included on the original roll.

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield to the Senator from Arizona.

Mr. HAYDEN. I served as a member of the Committee on World War Veterans' Legislation in the House of Representatives when the presumptive clause was debated and enacted. I can state authoritatively to the Senate that it was not done casually or from a wanton desire to add expense to the Treasury, but that we took the very best medical testimony obtainable, and the law which presumes the service origin of certain disabilities is based upon that testimony.

Mr. CUTTING. I thank the Senator from Arizona. He states the facts with entire accuracy.

The Senator from West Virginia [Mr. HATFIELD] said this morning, and has repeatedly testified before committees of this body, that the presumption of 5 years was medically not long enough; that it should have been 10 years. Some presumption obviously was necessary; and in response to that necessity, as the Senator from Arizona says, Congress adopted that method, not casually but deliberately, and with consideration of every factor involved.

In 1930 we found there were still a great many veterans who had suffered in the service who were not able to prove their service connection. It was then a question as to the best way to take care of them.

I opposed the bill which was ultimately adopted on the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], providing that men could be placed on the rolls without showing that their disabilities had service connection. I do not wish to enter into any controversy on this question, because it was a question of opinion as to the best method for handling these cases. But as a practical matter of history, the adoption of that amendment brought on the rolls a great many cases which were, theoretically at least, indefensible. Not all the people admitted to the rolls were indefensible cases, as the press has led so many to believe. A great many of them were cases whose disability was directly due to the service, but who were unable to prove it by a method satisfactory to the Bureau. In addition, of course, there were some undeserving cases.

During the last year the country has been bombarded by a series of articles by special writers digging out the undeserving cases, some of them coming under this disability allowance clause, others coming under the disabled emergency officers' retirement law, and these writers have published those facts to the country as though those cases were typical, although I think I am conservative in saying that there was not 1 case in 20 on the rolls which was not more than justified, if the history of the individual were carefully enough looked into.

As a result, a sentiment was built up against the veterans as a class. When the economy bill was before the Senate the average member of the public believed two things which were absolutely inconsistent with each other: First, that the Economy Act would strike from the rolls only cases which were not connected with the service, and, secondly, that the Economy Act would save between four and five hundred million dollars.

Both those things could not be true. Not more than perhaps a hundred and twenty-five million dollars was saved by cutting out the non-service-connected cases.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield.

Mr. WALSH. Does not the Senator think the fact that while the Economy Act was pending before the Congress the banks of the country were closed had a very great influence on the momentum and support given to that measure?

Mr. CUTTING. I am sure of it. I am not trying to allocate blame to Members of this body or to anyone outside of this body. I am trying to explain what happened.

The bill itself was camouflaged as a bill to maintain the credit of the United States. A few days ago the distinguished majority floor leader, the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], stated that everyone knew that a bill of that sort was necessary.

I deny the necessity for that legislation. I do not believe that the credit of the United States was enhanced in any way by the passage of that measure. The credit of the United States, in the last analysis, depends on the labor, the production, and the purchasing power of the individual citizenship of the United States, and on nothing else. Even if these cuts had not been made in war-connected cases, even if they had been justly made, nevertheless, the decrease in purchasing power involved was to that extent one more factor in intensifying the depression in this country.

Many Senators no doubt thought that we were merely rectifying some excessive favoritism which had been given to the veterans in the past. The distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS], in response to a query the other day by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], spoke as follows:

> The Senator from Wisconsin has said that we were told over and over that $400,000,000 would be saved. I do not think that impressed anybody in the Senate when that sort of talk was being indulged in at the time the economy bill was under consideration, because none of us could see where that amount of money could be saved.

I am sure other Senators took the same point of view. In other words, the administration made two statements, one that they were going to save between four and five hundred million dollars, a specific statement, and that statement apparently Senators did not believe; and the other, a vague statement, that the law would be administered with justice and sympathy, and with due consideration for the interest of the veterans. Senators believed the vague pledge and disbelieved the specific one. I hope that they will not fall into the same error this afternoon.

The Baltimore Sun, one of the great newspapers of the country, contains this morning a leading editorial entitled "Veterans." I will not quote it in full, and I merely mention it because it is typical of the confusion of thought into which the country has fallen on this issue. It begins by saying:

Senators and Representatives who have set out to fight the President's reorganization of the system of veterans' payments do not seem to be aware of what it is all about. To judge by their critical blasts on the floors of the two Houses or in statements to the newspapers, the President is a ruthless fellow who has undertaken to deprive hundreds of thousands of indigent but deserving heroes of their only sustenance. * * *

This sort of talk is all very well for campaign purposes, but it is not the way things really are.

Congressional disregard for the unorganized majority of taxpayers was responsible for the pension system in the first instance.

It goes on to say that Members of Congress are not aware of the difference between cases connected with the service and cases which were not connected with the service, and that while all the talk on the floor of the Senate had been in favor of the battle-scarred veterans, yet the real interest is to get back on the rolls men whose disabilities were not connected with the service in any respect. Says the article:

The congressional breast beaters ought not to be allowed to defeat this imperative reform merely to curry political favor with a few privilege seekers. They ought not to be allowed to masquerade as champions of the battle-scarred soldiers when, as a matter of plain fact, they are merely urging the perpetuation of a system of disgraceful abuses in which the battle-scarred veterans have no part.

Mr. President, the distinction which is habitually made between service-connected and non-service-connected cases is in many respects a misleading one. No human being in the world is able to say in any particular case, unless there is an overwhelming amount of specific proof, as to whether a particular disease was or was not actually caused by the service. The cases which have been on the rolls cannot be divided into service-connected and non-service-connected.

The only real distinction is with regard to the degree of proof. Cases can be divided into three classes: First, those who could prove their service connection, and by the workings of the Veterans' Administration that practically meant those who could prove service connection beyond a reasonable doubt; second, those who could not prove service connection, but whose service connection was presumed by reason of symptoms occurring within a certain space of time; and, third, those who were not required to prove service connection at all. In the latter class were included many most worthy cases who simply were unable to furnish irrefutable proof. Practically the entire mass of the veterans of the Spanish-American War came under this third class. They did not have to prove service connection, and, as the President has stated in one of his regulations, it is practically impossible in most cases for them to do so. Those are the cases which the critic of the old veteran's law asked us to leave off the rolls permanently.

The first class of cases, those who could prove service connection under the old law, are the only ones taken care of by the amendment which I originally offered and which the distinguished Senator from Arkansas has accused me of repudiating now that the Senate has voted for a more substantial measure of justice. It included a very small proportion of those deserving cases who have been cut off the rolls under the regulations issued since the middle of March. That particular group was a group which the Senate was assured before it voted on the Economy Act would be retained on the rolls.

As I stated a moment ago, during the speech of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH], that Senator, in offering his amendment, stated as follows:

It has been assumed that the President would make no cut and no reduction of any appreciable amount in connection with the veteran whose compensation is based upon disability as the result of direct service. Therefore, what we are doing is mereby to remove any possibility of discretionary action by the President. If he had it, he has practically said he would not disturb the rates, anyway. We are simply incorporating in the bill the provision that this group of veterans—

Mr. President, that was very definite language. I know that the Senator from Massachusetts was in the best of faith in making that statement.

The amendment which the Senator offered, however, through the interpretation given to it, was not administered in the way which the Senator anticipated, and which every other Senator on this floor relying on the statement of the Senator believed it would be administered.

Mr. WALSH. The Senator's statement is correct.

Mr. CUTTING. The amendment which I originally offered was prepared hastily, because it was a question of announcing 1 day in advance my intention of moving a suspension of the rules. It attempted to take care of that particular leak which had been left in the amendment which the Senator from Massachusetts proposed to the Economy Act, and which in practice nullified the intent of his amendment.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the provision, "except as to rates", which was incorporated in my amendment for the purpose of preventing the keeping on the rolls of veterans whose disabilities had been modified or changed, and therefore whose rates ought to have been changed, was incorporated in order to give power to change the whole rate structure.

Mr. CUTTING. I quite understand; and the difficulty with all this legislation is that whenever there is a loophole, we can count on the Veterans' Administration using it, regardless of anything which has been said on the floor of the Senate. The Veterans' Administration interpreted the Senator's amendment. The Senate did not give any particular consideration to the Senator's amendment. The Senate gave consideration to the Senator's speech. Se we must be careful that the actual amendments we adopt in their language, including every adjective and every adverb, be susceptible of one interpretation, and one interpretation only. If that be not done, it will make very little difference what anyone of us says on the floor of the Senate. We may give our own interpretation of our amendments, but we can be sure that the Veterans' Administration will pay no attention at all to such interpretations.

I think that a 25-percent cut is too great a cut in service-connected cases. The Senate has already voted on that question by a majority of, I think, 51 to 25, and it is too late to discuss that now. The amount of the cut, however, is less important to me personally than the keeping on the rolls of the men who ought to be there, no matter in which war they may have served.

We have been assured that deserving cases will be kept on the rolls, but no such assurance has been given to this body at this time—half as definite as was the assurance given by the Senator from Massachusetts in March—so I hope that this body will carefully examine every amendment in detail before it adopts it. My own belief is that the old regulations under which the Veterans' Administration was operating before March were on the whole a very sound set of regulations. I think the mistakes in them were very few in number. I am speaking now of the law as passed by Congress rather than of its administration. Here (exhibiting) is the old law. That is the size of it. That is the law which we repealed completely in March, wiping out every word of it, and there is not a word of it which was not put into the statute for some real definite purpose.

Now, we are told we must not be hasty; that we must not try to legislate on the floor of the Senate; that maybe we will hurt the regulations which have been drawn up; that maybe we will hurt the Economy Act; that maybe we will undo all the good which has been done.

Mr. President, I am trying to be temperate in my language when I say that in my judgment, the Economy Act was drawn up so as to exclude from the rolls every individual veteran who could possibly be excluded, and that, no matter how we liberalize that law, no matter how faulty a liberalizing amendment may be, it cannot help but be an improvement on the language of the Economy Act as we passed it in March. So I hope Senators will not be too fearful that some amendment which may be adopted on this floor will make a terrible gap in the wall of the present Economy Act, which excludes, and purposely excludes, so many deserving veterans from the rolls of the Government.

We have heard assurances as to what is to be done. I do not want to criticize those assurances, I hope some of them will turn out to be more definite than they seem to be as I read them. I am sorry the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] is not in the Chamber, but I shall read his remarks so as to be sure that I do not misquote him. This is the statement which he made day before yesterday, May 31:

The President of the United States, having had called to his attention by many ex-service men the effect of the regulations, has called the officials of the administration into conference, and has stated that the regulations, insofar as they provide the rates of compensation originally announced, will not be put into effect on July 1, but that certainly, on the contrary, as to men suffering disabilities of service origin, those rates of compensation are to be increased. A final determination as to the increase has not been reached so that it could be published today, but within the next few days it will be published, and the rates which have aroused the antagonism of Senators will never be put into effect insofar as the ex-service men suffering service-connected disabilities are concerned.

Mr. BYRNES entered the Chamber.

Mr. CUTTING. That pledge—I hope the Senator from South Carolina will correct me if I am in error—so far applies only to the service-connected cases, meaning the cases which under the new regulations are service-connected and not including those which were service-connected by presumption under the old regulations.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CLARK in the chair). Does the Senator from New Mexico yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator is correct. I specifically limited it to the information that I had definitely, and today I added to it the definite information I had as to the Spanish-American War veterans.

Mr. CUTTING. Yes; I am going to come to that in a moment.

That is a pledge, merely with regard to that particular class of cases, that the cuts made will not go into effect on July 1, but that sooner or later some change will be made in the status of that particular group of ex-service men.

The Senator from South Carolina proceeded, and said:

The President has appointed a committee, several members of which have been selected, which committee is to visit every hospital in the country and to investigate such charges as have been made today upon the floor of the Senate as to the treatment of men and as to the facilities available in the hospitals of the country. His instructions to the committee will be to report to him so that if any injustice is done to any man by any of those who are in charge of the hospitals of the Nation, that injustice will be remedied and the facilities of the hospitals will be made available and used.

That is the second promise; that a committee is going to be appointed which will go out and study all these cases, and if the committee finds any hardships anywhere they will come back and report them, and then, at some time or other, perhaps in 1945 or perhaps in 1950, those injustices will be rectified.

Then the Senator from South Carolina went on to say:

Furthermore, by direction of the President, a review is now being made of all those cases wherein the Veterans' Administration has held that the cases came within the class of presumptively service-connected, in order that no injustice may be done to any man who was removed from the rolls because he was only service-connected by presumption.

In other words, the third promise is that the Veterans' Administration, which itself is responsible for all the injustices which have been done, is going to review those cases, is going to review its own work, and perhaps in some case or other decide that it committed a serious injustice by the manner in which it administered the law.

In addition to that—

Said the Senator from South Carolina—

in this appropriation bill there is carried sufficient money to pay for the increased compensation that will be paid as the result of the action of the President, and when the Congress meets in January next any deficiency that is necessary in order to pay the expenses of the Veterans' Administration for the balance of the fiscal year can be provided.

Here, Mr. President, I think we come back to the same sort of situation which confronted the Congress in March.

I will quote from the Senator from South Carolina a little further:

We cannot possibly give the proper consideration to amendments offered here upon the floor of the Senate for such a purpose. Whenever we have attempted any such thing the result has been disastrous. We cannot possibly do justice when an amendment is offered to provide that there shall be no cut exceeding 25 percent for service-origin cases, because under the rates tentatively agreed upon service-origin cases will be reduced not more than 18 or 20 percent on the average, which is less than the prevailing rate.

In other words, the Senator from South Carolina states, in the first place, that there will be no reduction in these service-connected cases of more than 18 or 20 percent on an average, and, on the other hand, that there is enough money provided in this appropriation bill to take care of them all. Now, all I can say is——

Mr. BYRNES. I said there was certainly enough money to take care of them until Congress shall meet in January. I do not know whether it is in the RECORD or not, but certainly that was in my statement. I did not intend to mean that it was for the fiscal year. What I said I will say to the gentleman from New Mexico, was that it would not be necessary to add to the amount, because the total amount would be sufficient to pay the compensation until January, and then when the figures had been definitely ascertained we could provide whatever amount was necessary.

Mr. CUTTING. I am glad to have that explanation from the Senator.

Mr. BYRNES. That is what I had in mind.

Mr. CUTTING. The Senator did mention the fact that there would be a deficiency bill, as I quoted him just now, but certainly in this bill there is not a sufficient appropriation to take care of that increased compensation.

Mr. BYRNES. I agree to that.

Mr. CUTTING. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the language of the Economy Act, which in its first sentence provides a limitation on the rest of the appropriation.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from New Mexico yield further to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CUTTING. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. I am familiar with that act, and the same language is in the Budget law, but the interpretation is such that it would not really affect what the Senator has in mind.

Mr. CUTTING. I am glad to have that assurance from the Senator, because we want to be very sure about all these things in advance.

Mr. BYRNES. I think we should be.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I think those were the three main points that the Senator from South Carolina made the other day.

This morning, as I understood him, he said that the President sometime ago had announced that there would be a review of all these cases. I assume that the Senator referred to the promise which the President made to Commander Johnson, of the American Legion.

Mr. BYRNES. Yes.

Mr. CUTTING. Then the Senator said that 2 days ago he himself had stated that service-connected cases would not be cut on an average of more than 18 or 20 percent, although they would be rated on a different basis, and he went on to add that, while no final determination had been reached about the Spanish-American War veterans, the minimum would be $15 per month. Is that correct?

Mr. BYRNES. Yes; that statement is correct.

Mr. CUTTING. And that no determination had been made as to the presumptive cases, but that consideration was being given that question, and some announcement would be made—I think the Senator said before the 1st of July.

Mr. BYRNES. I have no definite information, but the impression made upon me is that it would be made long before the 1st of July.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, are the presumptive cases Spanish-American War cases or World War cases?

Mr. CUTTING. I was referring to World War cases. Of course, the Spanish-American War cases are also presumptive cases under the new regulations. I do not know whether that was specifically included in the statement made by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. WALSH. I notice that the language was used following a reference to the Spanish-American War veterans' cases, and it seems to me the inference to be drawn is that it relates to the presumptive Spanish-American War cases. Does the Senator think it applies also to World War cases?

Mr. CUTTING. I would prefer to have the Senator ask that question of the Senator from South Carolina, because it was his statement to which I was referring. I presume that he included the World War presumptive cases.

Mr. WALSH. Was the reference to Spanish-American War cases, placing a minimum of $15, only to Spanish-American War cases that are now under the regulations entitled to compensation?

Mr. CUTTING. So I understood, but I hope the Senator will ask that question of the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. WALSH. I wish the Senator from South Carolina would give me that information.

Mr. BYRNES. While I did not follow the colloquy entirely, if the Senator was referring to Spanish-American War veterans, my information was that, with reference to the amendment introduced by the Senator from Washington [Mr. DILL], which sought to provide a pension and a different status for those over 62, that, regardless of the disability, the minimum rate to be paid to any Spanish-American War veteran would be $15, and where there was a Spanish-American War veteran over 62 suffering from disability, that the amount of compensation would be greater, but the exact scale of increase had not been determined.

Mr. WALSH. Does the Senator understand that the Spanish-American War veterans who are now eliminated under the regulations will be restored to the list?

Mr. BYRNES. No.

Mr. WALSH. I do not understand that either. It is simply that instead of the minimum of $6 which is now provided, certain of them will be increased to $15.

Mr. BYRNES. That is it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, it is utterly impossible for us to hear what is transpiring. We are all intensely interested in whatever it is that may be said by the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from South Carolina. I ask for order in the Chamber.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please be in order.

Mr. WALSH. I understand from what the Senator from South Carolina stated that the raising of the minimum from $6 to $15 applies only to Spanish War veterans who were under the regulations on the list to receive pensions?

Mr. CUTTING. That is quite true.

Mr. WALSH. We ought to find out from the Senator also what class of veterans is meant by the second statement read by the Senator from New Mexico. Will he read it again for the benefit of the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. CUTTING. I quoted the Senator from South Carolina as saying that the presumptive cases were being given consideration, and that an announcement would be made sometime in the near future. I assume the Senator from South Carolina was referring to World War veterans whose disability had previously been connected with the service by reason of presumption.

Mr. BYRNES. My information was that as to presumptive cases of either class, as to every other regulation affecting widows and every regulation that has been issued, they are being reviewed by the President now with the idea of making changes in them.

Mr. WALSH. With the idea possibly of a new policy?

Mr. BYRNES. What policy would be adopted or whether there would be any change, or whether a change in the rate only, I am not able to say.

Mr. WALSH. Of course, the two classes are now all off the list, and whether they should be restored in whole or in part is being studied.

Mr. BYRNES. Of course, the question as to whether presumptive cases should be returned to the list just as they were on the list at the time of the passage of the Economy Act and returned to the amount of compensation then paid, my information was that it is not in contemplation that they should be returned to the same scale of compensation as the battle-wounded veterans.

Mr. WALSH. Or even so far as the Senator knows they may never be returned to the list under the regulations?

Mr. BYRNES. That has not been determined, according to my information.

Mr. WALSH. Both subjects are still subject to review.

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I appreciate very much this interruption because it clarifies the whole situation in my mind and I am sure in the mind of every other Senator. I now say with all due deference to the Senator from South Carolina that I think there is nothing in any of those pledges which should prevent Senators from going ahead with their duty and legislating in accordance with the dictates of their consciences.

What do these pledges amount to? First, a review by the Veterans' Administration of the justice or injustice of their own acts. Second, the appointment of a committee which is to go all over the country and investigate individual cases and report back at some time in the distant future. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] added to that statement that the President had assured him that many members of the committee would be members of the American Legion. I submit that that makes very little difference. We could easily find members of the American Legion who are in such financial circumstances that they are not particularly interested in the welfare of the disabled. The distinguished Director of the Budget, Mr. Lewis Douglas, is a member of the American Legion. So is the Veterans' Administrator, General Hines. I am not singling out these men for criticism. I listened to the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] the other day when he stated he thought General Hines, personally, is not in sympathy with some of the cuts made. That is not the point at issue. These men, by reason of the regulations which have been issued, are regarded by the ex-service men throughout the Nation today as the two most rabid enemies they have in the world. The veterans are not going to pay any attention to a promise that the injustices which have been done will be rectified by those men or by any of their agents.

When we come here and say that a committee is to go around the country investigating individual cases, are we not getting back to the Hoover policy which Members on the other side of the aisle so repeatedly ridiculed? Whenever anything had to be done the former President appointed a commission to go out and investigate, and when the commission reported its conclusions, the report in several volumes would be placed in a pigeonhole somewhere in the files of the Executive offices.

That is not what the veterans are asking today. It is now 3 weeks since the commander of the American Legion visited the President. The assurance was made at that time that in the immediate future these horrible injustices of which Senators have been complaining would be rectified by administrative regulation. Do Senators realize how long it would take to correct such injustices as we have heard about on the floor of this Chamber? Just about 20 minutes. If we want a change made in any Veterans' Administration law or any veterans' regulation, and if we want it drafted in legal form, we can get an expert from the Bureau and I will guarantee it will not take 20 minutes' time to formulate the wording. There is no excuse for the delay that has occurred.

When promises are held before us, let us remember that these men are dying and that we have to act now because the Congress may be adjourned by the time the 1st of July comes, and that is the date when most of these regulations are going into effect. Even according to the promise of the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] the only cases which will be exempted after the 1st of July will be the small group of cases whose service connection has still been maintained in spite of the provisions of the Economy Act. So we have to act now if we want to save any of these men. We have to know definitely what the Congress wants to do. If it wants to let these men die, then it should say so.

Mr. President, I come from a State in which about 5,000 so-called "presumptive cases" will be thrown out on the streets on the 1st of July. People say, "They could not prove their service connection." Some of them could not. But as human beings, these men who served their country, these men who cannot rise from the bed of pain and sickness, are just as deserving of consideration as the men who lost both legs or both arms. In every veterans' hospital in my State, and the same applies to my sister State of Arizona, there have been catastrophic epidemics of hemorrhages and there have been suicides, and the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] knows it. That situation will continue. Men are going out of their minds through the fear which comes from what is going to happen to them on the 1st of July.

Mr. President, since the veterans' regulations were issued on the 31st of March I doubt if I have had a good night's sleep. I have had these cases brought to me day after day by the score and by the hundred. I am not going to read any of them to the Senate. Not one of them is any more pitiful than those which have been brought to the attention of the Senate by the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] and by other distinguished Senators. They are the same kind. That same condition applies to every State in the Union. We must not leave here until we have done justice to them. We cannot salve our own consciences by believing that some way or other somewhere else some man will stand up and save these people we were not willing to save.

I think Senators realize that I am speaking with no partisan purpose in view. I certainly do not wish that any word I have said should be interpreted as a personal criticism of the President of the United States. I suppose I have known Franklin D. Roosevelt longer than any man on this floor. I have known him nearly 40 years. I regard him with the highest affection and admiration. I deserted my own party affiliations in order to support him for the Presidency. I admire the courage he has displayed in handling the affairs of the country in a time of need, even though I may disagree with some of the details of his program.

Mr. President, if all these cases were coming before Franklin D. Roosevelt, we would not have to worry about them. But they are not coming before Franklin D. Roosevelt. They are coming before the President of the United States, and when we say the President of the United States we are not talking about an individual. We are talking about a machine. We are talking about some clerk down in some bureau, somebody who is issuing a regulation or carrying out a precedent laid down by some other regulation made by some other clerk with no more authority than he has. We cannot rely on that sort of thing. We have been delaying here too long. Let us do our duty this afternoon and rectify this law insofar as we believe it ought to be rectified. That is our duty. We cannot shirk it. We cannot talk about the President of the United States. We cannot talk about partisan considerations as if they had anything to do with this question.

There is, of course, a definite question when we vote on any particular amendment as to whether it is better or worse than the language for which it is substituted. My own belief is that the amendment which will be offered by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] is the fairest, the most carefully constructed piece of legislation that has so far been suggested on this floor.

I know it is far better than the amendment which I prepared and introduced hastily the other day when there seemed to be little hope that the Senate would take the slightest interest in this question or bring it up for consideration at all. We have gone beyond that. The Senate has shown very clearly today that it is intensely interested in the subject and that it proposes to deal with it thoroughly and courageously and in accordance with the dictates of the consciences of its Members.

Whether or not Senators agree with me that the amendment the Senator from Oregon is going to introduce is, on the whole, the fairest of the various proposals which have been made, the general purpose of all these proposals is the same. Let us go ahead and vote. Then when we go home we can at least say to our constituents that as far as we are concerned we did what we considered our duty to those who served this country in its hour of need.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment, in the nature of a substitute, offered by the Senator from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] to the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL].

Mr. CONNALLY, Mr. LONG, and other Senators called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, I ask to have the amendment stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be restated.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Notwithstanding any of the provisions of the act approved March 20, 1933, entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government", in no event shall World War service-connected disability compensation of any veteran, or the pension of any veteran of a war prior to the World War, or the pension of any widow and/or dependents of such veterans, be reduced more than 25 percent of the rate being received prior to March 15, 1933.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], who is absent. I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. PATTERSON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER], who is necessarily absent from the Chamber. I am informed that on this question he would vote "yea." If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay." I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HEBERT (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a general pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], who if present would, as I understand, vote as I have voted. Therefore I shall permit my vote to stand.

I desire to announce the general pair of the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. I do not know how the Senator from Vermont would vote on this question.

I also wish to announce the general pair of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] and the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY]. I do not know how the Senator from Delaware would vote on this question.

Mr. KENDRICK. I desire to announce that the following Senators are necessarily detained from the Senate on official business: The Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], and the Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER].

The legislative clerk recapitulated the vote.

Mr. CLARK. Mr. President, how am I recorded?

The VICE PRESIDENT. As voting in the affirmative.

Mr. CLARK. I desire to change my vote from "yea" to "nay."

The roll call resulted—yeas 42, nays 42, as follows:

The VICE PRESIDENT. On this question the yeas are 42, the nays are 42. The Chair votes "yea", and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, a point of order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator will state it.

Mr. LONG. Would not the amendment fail on a tie vote?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It would.

Mr. LONG. Then the Chair would not have any vote, would he?

The VICE PRESIDENT. He has one, and he has already cast it. [Laughter.]

The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Florida [Mr. TRAMMELL], as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to insert, at the proper place in the bill, the following:

Section 5 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, approved January 22, 1932, is amended by adding after the words "agricultural credit corporation", in the eighth line of said section the following: "producers of finished articles, from raw or unmanufactured materials, the products of the soil or forest."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, this amendment adds to the list of those who may borrow from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation; and I want to read the addition that it will make if agreed to:

Producers of finished articles, from raw or unmanufactured materials, the products of the soil or forest.

It is easily seen just what that means. It will allow certain companies—for instance, cotton mills, flour mills, and other concerns which produce or manufacture articles from raw or unmanufactured materials the products of the soil or forest—to borrow from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

The truth of the matter is that these companies can no longer borrow money under our Federal Reserve system of banking. They ought to be permitted to do so. They will have to go into bankruptcy if they cannot, thus throwing out of employment thousands of people who are now employed. It is my judgment that the borrowing powers are too restricted now.

If we allow banks, trust companies, insurance companies, and other companies, many of which employ very few people, to borrow from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, certainly those companies which employ laborers, which employ thousands of people all the time, and which will no doubt go into bankruptcy unless they are able to get additional money, ought to be added to the list.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, a lot of those to whom the Reconstruction Finance Corporation have loaned money went into bankruptcy after they got the money, did they not?

Mr. McKELLAR. Not these.

Mr. BARKLEY. No; but others.

Mr. McKELLAR. I do not know to what extent banks and insurance companies and others have gone into bankruptcy. Some of them no doubt have, but if it is right to lend money to banks and to trust companies and to mortgage companies and to insurance companies, which do not employ a great number of people, I see no reason in the world why these other establishments—for example, cotton mills, flour mills, or other concerns—which employ large numbers of men, should not be allowed to have the privilege of borrowing from this institution.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator from Tennessee has very truthfully just stated that business enterprises of this nature have been practically debarred from getting credit from the banks, despite the help extended to the banks by the Government and all the relief efforts which have been made to enable the banks to extend more credit.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia is exactly right. These concerns have been barred from obtaining any credit from the banks. They are in the hardest kind of circumstances. They keep more people employed than all these companies which have been favored heretofore, and in order to keep them going we must give them the right to borrow from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. RUSSELL. The Senator from Tennessee might also point out that if something along this line is not done there will be no market for farm products in this country.

Mr. McKELLAR. It is very hard to see how there will be. I think the Senator is exactly right.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, did I understand the Senator to say that unless they could borrow some money from the Government for these plants they would go into bankruptcy?

Mr. McKELLAR. I say this, they have not the money with which to continue in business, and, of course, it is just a question of time when they must fail if they do not have the money with which to conduct their business.

Mr. TYDINGS. Without taking exception to the Senator's amendment, we are lending not our own money but the taxpayers' money, and it occurs to me that if a concern is likely to go into bankruptcy at all, we had better not lend it any money.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, that would be true of the banks and the trust companies and the mortgage companies and other companies to which we are now lending money.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. I wanted to inquire whether the Senator's amendment is not broad enough practically to cover every manufacturing plant in the country.

Mr. McKELLAR. I think not.

Mr. ADAMS. What would be excluded?

Mr. McKELLAR. I have not examined as to the several companies which have been excluded.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I make the point of order that the Senate is not in order, and that we cannot hear what is going on.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The point of order is well taken. Senators desiring to have conferences will please retire from the Chamber.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I do not want to take up the time of the Senate. It seems to me that this addition to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation's powers should be permitted. The loans must be well collateralled. That Corporation cannot lend money to these companies unless they have good security to offer. There will be no question of security, but where a company of the kind mentioned here has proper security it ought to have the right in times like these, when it cannot get the money from the banks, to go before the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and obtain the money. So I ask the Senate to agree to the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. McKELLAR. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask merely for information, because it was impossible to follow the debate on this side of the Chamber a short time ago. For instance, the amendment provides that loans may be made to producers of finished articles from raw or unmanufactured materials or products of the soil or forests. What has the Senator in mind?

Mr. McKELLAR. Any article; for instance, manufactures from cotton, manufactures from grain, manufactures from fruits, and other manufactures which are from the forests or from the soil. It includes all such articles.

Mr. President, I ask that the amendment be agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I desire to make a point of order against the amendment. Notice was given by the Senator of his intention to move to suspend the rules.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the Senator from Tennessee has given notice of intention to make a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I make the motion now.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion to suspend rule XVI and proceed to consider the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I desire to be heard on this motion. The Senate should understand what would be the effect of the amendment now offered by the Senator from Tennessee.

Regardless of what particular problem may be in the mind of the Senator from Tennessee the language of the amendment is that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall have the power to lend money to producers of finished articles from raw or unmanufactured materials or products of the soil or forests, so that it means that, as to a manufacturer producing anything, he will have the power to borrow from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation.

Mr. WALSH. Such as furniture, cotton textiles, and wool textiles?

Mr. BYRNES. The packers, and those producing manufactures from raw materials, like the United States Steel Co., the Bethlehem Steel Co., and similar organizations.

Mr. WALSH. If this amendment should be adopted, we might as well close the banks and turn the United States Government into a big bank.

Mr. BYRNES. It means nothing else. Before the Committee on Banking and Currency amendments are pending which seek to do what is proposed here. It is proposed to have the Reconstruction Finance Corporation authorized to lend money to States, counties, and cities, to finance all of the denominational colleges of the country, to finance the potash mines of the West, the cotton mills of the South, the packers, and all other manufacturers of any commodity. If we do that, we may as well realize that it means that it will take $20,000,000,000.

Mr. TYDINGS. That would not start it.

Mr. BYRNES. The Senator from Maryland says that would not start it. If we should do that, surely there would come a day of reckoning. As long as the Christmas tree located down the Avenue has been opened to railroads, banks and trust companies, Members of the Senate have declared that it was hopeless to expect the collection of the amounts loaned. Because we made a mistake in passing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act, I want to know whether the Senate is going to say that because a man is a manufacturer he shall be given the right to come to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and borrow directly. If he happens to be in some other business, that right is to be denied him. Some of the people are to be taxed in order that we may lend money to manufacturers of various commodities.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I inquire of the Senator whether this would include loans to manufacturers of conservation-camp toilet kits?

Mr. BYRNES. I do not know whether the Senator has been manufacturing kits or whether he is interested in that, but the amendment would include the manufacturer of any commodity.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BYRNES. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. The Senator says we would be helping the manufacturer, that we would be taking his part, that we would be legislating in his favor. Is not the same argument to be made against those to whom we are lending now? We are lending to banks, we are lending to trust companies, we are lending to mortgage companies, we are lending to insurance companies; and if so, why not treat all alike? Why not treat the business world in exactly the same way in which insurance companies and the banking world are treated? Why should we make fish of one and fowl of another? I should like to hear what the Senator has to say about that.

Mr. BYRNES. If the Senator from Tennessee will ever finish, he will hear what the Senator from South Carolina has to say about that.

The Senator from South Carolina believes that it was a mistake ever to enter into that activity, but because we made a mistake of authorizing loans to railroads and banks and trust companies is no reason why now we should say that we will go farther and make the mistake of lending to all the manufacturers of the country. When the Senator from Tennessee says it is not to help the manufacturers, I reply that whenever you lend money to me, you are helping me, and whenever you lend money to any man you help him. Whenever you tax an American citizen in order that you may be able to lend money to another American citizen, that first citizen must go out and work and labor and come and give of that money earned by his thought and his energy, so that it may be loaned to another man.

The Senator would have us provide that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation shall be authorized to lend to every corporation, individual, or partnership in the United States of America, and if we did that and established a bank here, certainly we would have to close all the banks of the country. It would be the end of any attempt to have a banking system, and it would put the Government into the business of lending money from Washington over all this Nation, with its 48 States and its 130,000,000 people, with absolutely no chance of its being done in a businesslike way.

I hope the motion to suspend the rules will not prevail.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, just one word in reply. The Senator says that we would do away with the banking business if we adopted my amendment. If we destroy the manufacturing interests of this country, especially those which manufacture articles from the soil, the banks will be out of business anyway. Why should we legislate here for the banks? The Senator from South Carolina voted for the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act when it was passed. Why should we legislate for the banks and trust companies and railroads, and not lend money to others in a like situation? I do not think we ought to make fish of one and fowl of the other, and I sincerely hope that the rules may be suspended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on suspending the rules and proceeding to the consideration of the amendment offered by the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR]. [Putting the question.] Two thirds of the Senators present not having voted to suspend the rules, the motion is rejected.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, and ask that it be read by the clerk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The clerk will report the amendment for the information of the Senate.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 10, after line 17, to insert the following:

That the Civil Service Commission shall be empowered to investigate and conciliate differences between employees and their superiors in any of the Government departments or independent establishments, and to set up machinery within or without the departments and independent establishments for that purpose. To facilitate action, the head of each department or independent establishment shall, if requested by the Civil Service Commission, set up a board to make preliminary hearings and adjustments. The Commission shall have final power to enforce its decisions in every department and independent establishment of the Government and there shall be no appeal except to the President of the United States. To carry out the provisions of this act the Civil Service Commission shall be empowered to appoint a liaison officer at a salary of $6,000 per annum, who shall have had at least 15 years of service in the Federal classified civil service.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I will state briefly the purpose of the amendment. Under the provisions of the Economy Act thousands of employees who have been in the Government service for a long period of time will be laid off. In some instances grave injustice will undoubtedly be done. The amendment provides when such wholesale laying off of employees takes place by reason of the program under the Economy Act an employee who is unjustly laid off shall have the opportunity to have his case heard and to have an appeal. It will not cost the Government anything except $6,000 that will be paid to the liaison officer, who will be some person who has been in the Government service for a long time.

I appreciate, Mr. President, that the amendment is subject to a point of order, but I was going to ask unanimous consent that it be taken up at this time, for the reason that it is exceedingly important that such employees as are about to be laid off be given an opportunity to appeal their cases and have a hearing upon them. My understanding is that this amendment has been worked out by the Civil Service Commission itself. I am likewise informed that it has the approval of the Director of the Budget and also has the approval of all the employees of the Government.

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am sorry the Senator has stated that this amendment has the approval of the Director of the Budget. What is wrong with it?

Mr. WHEELER. It not only has the approval of the Director of the Budget, but it likewise has the approval of the employees of the Government and their representatives, and it has the approval, as I understand, of the Civil Service Commission itself.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator from Montana yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BRATTON in the chair). Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. WHEELER. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. Would it not be probable that under this amendment employees would be put into the various governmental agencies which have been recently established to the exclusion of others who might be employed?

Mr. WHEELER. No; that is not my understanding at all.

Mr. McKELLAR. Would not that be the natural effect of the amendment?

Mr. WHEELER. I do not think so.

Mr. McKELLAR. If those employees have the right to appeal, they would simply be transferred to some other department.

Mr. WHEELER. I do not think that would be the effect of it at all. I think it would simply have effect in cases where mistakes may be made. At the present time when a department makes a mistake and lays off an employee who is entitled to be kept on the roll he has no right whatsoever of appeal. This amendment, if adopted, would simply provide for the right of appeal in instances of that kind, and that kind only.

Mr. BONE and Mr. BYRNES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. I desire to call up at this time——

Mr. McKELLAR. I think we should first act on the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is an amendment pending.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognizes the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. BYRNES. I regret that I shall have to make a point of order against the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]. The Senator presented the amendment to me a few moments ago. I have not been able to read it carefully and to understand adequately what it proposes to do. I really think that an amendment of this kind should be referred to the Civil Service Committee, so that it might be carefully studied. I gather, from a hasty reading of the amendment, that it proposes to set up an arbitration board in each department and to give the Civil Service Commission the right to provide machinery to settle difficulties between the departments and their employees. I shall have to make the point of order against the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair, the point of order is well taken, and is sustained.

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE] and I have each offered an amendment which is practically the same in purview. The other day I filed a motion to suspend the rule in order that the amendment might be considered; but I understand the chairman of the committee in charge of the bill has no objection to the amendment. It will be recalled that soldiers who have been wounded in actual combat with an enemy, though not in war, as in fighting the Moros, under a strict construction of the law cannot receive hospital treatment, which is accorded to other veterans who have been injured in line of duty in war. It is to correct that situation that the amendment is drawn, and I hope the chairman of the committee will accept it.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Maryland yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. TYDINGS. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. When the amendment was offered a few days ago, I said I had no objection to it, and I have no objection to it now.

Mr. TYDINGS. I send the amendment to the desk and move its adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland offers an amendment, which will be read.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 47, line 10, after the word " amended ", it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided further, That in addition to the pensions provided in this title the Administrator of Veterans' Affairs is hereby authorized under such limitations as may be prescribed by the President, and within the limits of existing Veterans' Administration facilities, to furnish to men discharged from the Army, Navy, Marine Corps, or Coast Guard for disabilities incurred in line of duty and to veterans of any war, including the Boxer rebellion and the Philippine insurrection, domiciliary care where they are suffering with permanent disabilities, tuberculosis, or neuropsychiatric ailments, and medical and hospital treatment for diseases or injuries.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, may I say that the addition of the admission of peace-time veterans, as explained by the Senator from Maryland, to hospitalization is not a matter within the discretion of the President under the Economy Act. The President could not under that act authorize such hospitalization. This amendment, if adopted, will, of course, change the basic law so that the President may admit peace-time battle-wounded veterans into a hospital.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maryland.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. DIETERICH. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment which I think is agreeable to the chairman of the committee. It provides that a portion of the appropriation carried in this bill may be used to pay the expenses of patients who are housed in hospitals belonging to the States.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Illinois offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 44, line 6, it is proposed to strike out " $85,273,000 " and to insert " $86,273,000: Provided, That not to exceed $1,000,000 of this amount may be used for payments to State institutions caring for and maintaining veterans suffering from neuropsychiatric ailments, when found to be to the best interest of the United States."

Mr. BYRNES. I have examined this amendment. I have learned that there are a number of men who are in State institutions, and under this amendment, if adopted, the Veterans' Administration will have the authority, if it deems it to be wise, to send a suffering veteran to an institution of the State. I have no objection to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The quesion is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Illinois.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I now move to reconsider the vote had upon May 31 by which the Senate disagreed to the committee amendment on page 53, and lines 1 and 2, page 54 of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. What is the nature of that amendment?

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President——

Mr. STEIWER. The amendment reported by the committee proposed to strike out the provision permitting the President to cancel or modify certain contracts which are defined in that section.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York suggests the absence of a quorum. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Costigan	Kendrick	Robinson, Ind.
Ashurst	Cutting	Keyes	Russell
Bachman	Dale	King	Schall
Bankhead	Dickinson	La Follette	Sheppard

Clark	Hayden	Pope	White
Connally	Hebert	Reed
Coolidge	Johnson	Reynolds
Copeland	Kean	Robinson, Ark.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] to reconsider the vote whereby the amendment indicated by him was agreed to.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I move to lay the motion of the Senator from Oregon on the table.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, is this question debatable?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I ask the Senator from Tennessee not to make the motion in order that an opportunity may be afforded further to explain this matter.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, we have debated this question heretofore, and it seems to me that it has been fully discussed in every way; it has been voted upon; and it ought to remain as it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs upon the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. STEIWER. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BONE. A vote in the affirmative is a vote to table the motion of the Senator from Oregon, is it not?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is correct. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HEBERT (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS]. I do not know how he would vote if present. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. PATTERSON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement in regard to my general pair, I am uninformed how the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] would vote if present. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HEBERT. I wish to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]; and

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] with the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. BAILEY].

I am informed that the Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] and the Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] if present would vote "nay" on this question.

Mr. PATTERSON. I am informed by the senior Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] that his colleague the junior Senator from New York [Mr. WAGNER] would vote as I intend to vote. Therefore I feel free to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. GLASS. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN], who is necessarily absent. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. ASHURST. My colleague the junior Senator from Arizona [Mr. HAYDEN] is detained from the Chamber on other official business.

Mr. KENDRICK. I wish to announce that the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN] has a general pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS].

I also wish to announce that the following-named Senators are necessarily absent on official business: Mr. BAILEY, Mr. DILL, Mr. LEWIS, Mr. LOGAN, Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. SMITH, and Mr. WAGNER.

The result was announced—yeas, 44, nays 36, as follows:

YEAS—44

Adams	Capper	Gore	Pope
Bachman	Caraway	Harrison	Reynolds
Bankhead	Clark	Kendrick	Robinson, Ark.
Barkley	Connally	King	Russell
Black	Costigan	La Follette	Sheppard
Bone	Cutting	McGill	Thomas, Okla.
Bratton	Dieterich	McKellar	Thomas, Utah
Brown	Duffy	Murphy	Thompson
Bulkley	Erickson	Neely	Tydings
Bulow	Fletcher	Norris	Walsh
Byrnes	Frazier	Overton	Wheeler

NAYS—36

Ashurst	Fess	McAdoo	Shipstead
Barbour	George	McCarran	Steiwer
Borah	Goldsborough	McNary	Stephens
Byrd	Hale	Metcalf	Townsend
Carey	Hatfield	Nye	Trammell
Coolidge	Johnson	Patterson	Vandenberg
Copeland	Kean	Reed	Van Nuys
Dale	Lonergan	Robinson, Ind.	Walcott
Dickinson	Long	Schall	White

NOT VOTING—16

Austin	Dill	Hebert	Norbeck
Bailey	Glass	Keyes	Pittman
Couzens	Hastings	Lewis	Smith
Davis	Hayden	Logan	Wagner

So Mr. McKELLAR's motion to lay Mr. STEIWER's motion on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, I wish to announce that I voted "nay" for the reason that there was such great confusion in the Chamber. I am sure many Senators did not know what the question was. There was no debate. I wish we could have had some debate on the question. I usually vote against laying motions on the table, but I should like to have heard some explanation about what we were laying on the table and what the main question was. There was such confusion that I could not hear what was going on.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from Tennessee?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. McKELLAR. On the 31st of May, 2 days ago, the question of giving the President the right to modify, and even in some cases to cancel, contracts made for the carriage of mail by steamship and airship companies was before the Senate. It was discussed at length. It was settled, as I remember, by a majority vote of 7. The Senator from Oregon

[Mr. STEIWER] made a motion to reconsider the vote by which that amendment was agreed to. I made the motion to lay on the table the motion of the Senator from Oregon.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arizona yield for an observation?

Mr. ASHURST. Certainly.

Mr. STEIWER. Supplementing what was just said by the Senator from Tennessee, the vote on May 31 was a vote of 35 to 27. The total number participating in that vote was 63. There were 33 Senators not present in the Chamber. Senators will remember that the vote was had during the morning when we met at the hour of 10 o'clock. Many Senators were engaged in important committee meetings and did not find it possible to be here at that time. I desired to have a vote upon this important question. Many other Senators desired to have a vote upon it. I accordingly made the motion to reconsider. I realize that the Senator from Tennessee was within his rights when he made the motion to table the motion to reconsider, but nevertheless I deeply regret that he saw fit to exercise that right under the circumstances.

Mr. ASHURST. I am content.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arizona yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. I am extremely sorry that the Senate, without hearing any discussion on the matter, has acted as it did. I thought the other day, with the very brief statement that was made to the small number of Senators present, that perhaps it was well to let it go as we did let it go. But this involves the whole question of the future of the American merchant marine. Great Britain is striving in every way possible to destroy our American merchant marine. I placed in the RECORD the official report of the British Chamber of Shipping wherein they pointed out what they are striving to do, to destroy the subsidies particularly in our country.

I want to say, in all good feeling, because it does not make a particle of difference to me personally, that there will be great rejoicing in Great Britain over what we have done. We are seeking to hamstring, or whether we are seeking to do it, nevertheless by what we have done we are about to hamstring the American merchant marine. With the provisions which we have enacted, it permits the President to abrogate solemn contracts, to do that with not only fraudulent contracts but any contract having to do with the carrying of mail.

Our shipping has been largely subsidized by our country. It means, in my opinion, that there will be brought back on the hands of the American Government great numbers of ships because of the loss of credit which our American lines will suffer.

So I wanted to say that. The Senator from Tennessee would not grant us the courtesy of a discussion of the matter today, but I wanted to give some proof of the thesis I have presented.

What we have done today, Senators, in my opinion, will have tremendous ill effects on American shipping and upon our country in general.

Mr. KING. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KING. The observations just submitted by the Senator from New York are not new in this Chamber. I shall not state that his present speech is a repetition of former ones. Indeed, a good speech perhaps is worthy of repetition; and the Senator has made an admirable speech today, as he has upon former occasions.

The Senator, however, in his utterances upon the merchant marine is not dissimilar to Jeremiah of old, whose melancholy prophecies did not always fall upon willing ears. He is an able defender of the merchant marine, and sincerely desires its development. But some of his prophecies, in my judgment, never will be fulfilled.

A number of shipping companies of the United States have been favorites of the Government and have obtained large subsidies at a time when subsidies ought not to have been granted, and have received contracts for the carrying of mail from which they have derived enormous profits; indeed, profits so great that in some instances vessels were paid for in a limited number of voyages.

This matter has been discussed at great length in the Senate during the past 5 or 6 years. Many matters have been placed in the RECORD after full discussion showing the condition of our merchant marine and the subsidies received by them from the United States. In my opinion, no further discussion was necessary upon the motion of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR].

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President——

Mr. ASHURST. I have an amendment to offer on another matter, but I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. MCKELLAR. I merely desire to make a statement.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BANKHEAD. What is before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Arizona is about to offer an amendment. There is no pending question.

Mr. ASHURST. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 57, after line 25, it is proposed to insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. —. That the provisions of section 215 of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative branch of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932" (Public Law No. 212, 72d Cong.), as amended by the act entitled "An act to maintain the credit of the United States Government" (Public Law No. 2, 73d Cong.), shall not apply to members of the Metropolitan Police force and the Fire Department of the District of Columbia.

Mr. ASHURST obtained the floor.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for just a moment?

Mr. ASHURST. I yield to the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. President, the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] was ungracious enough to say that I had treated him discourteously in making a motion to lay on the table. I intended no discourtesy whatever to the Senator. I was entirely within my rights and within the rules. One of the reasons why I did it—I would not have mentioned it otherwise—was that I recall that on a similar bill affecting the merchant marine, some years ago, the Senator from New York entered a motion to reconsider and kept that bill from passing, and kept it before the Senate for the remainder of the session. This is an appropriation bill and I did not want this bill to die in the same way. That was one of the reasons that actuated me in moving to lay on the table the motion to reconsider made by the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER].

I desire to say that I am not inimical to a merchant marine. I think America can maintain a merchant marine. I do not believe that giving the President authority to modify these very remarkable contracts that have been made and to reduce services and to reduce trips, if necessary, will in the slightest degree affect our merchant marine.

I believe that a righteous verdict has been twice reached in the consideration of this bill.

Mr. ASHURST. Mr. President, a word now on the amendment I have offered.

The amendment provides that the Metropolitan Police and firemen of the District of Columbia shall not have their annual leave reduced but shall have their 20 days instead of 15 days' leave.

Mr. President, the hour is late; Senators are weary; and I have but to say that I have a list here showing that in the past 5 months one captain worked 119 extra hours.

A certain sergeant worked 85 hours extra time.

A certain lieutenant worked 107 hours extra.

A certain private worked 83 hours extra.

I believe that the Metropolitan Police and firemen should have their 20 days' leave instead of having it reduced to 15 days.

I realize, of course, that this amendment is subject to a point of order. I realize that it is legislation on an appropriation bill. I hope, however, that the genial, warmhearted, able Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], in charge of the bill, will let this amendment go to conference. I appeal to him to relax the rigidity of the rules so that these Metropolitan Police and firemen—and in all America there are no more efficient policemen or efficient firemen—will not have their annual leave reduced from 20 to 15 days.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from Arizona has nothing more to say, because he is almost too persuasive. [Laughter.]

Mr. President, I have to make the point of order. This question was gone into fully. The object was to put all the employees of the Government on the same basis insofar as leave of absence with pay was concerned. We fixed the leave at 15 days; and if we now make an exception for one, there is no just reason for refusing to give to all of the other employees, here and throughout the country, leave in excess of 15 days.

I make the point of order on the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken, and it is sustained.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 48, line 18, it is proposed to strike out "$231,730,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$401,730,000."

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, in explanation of the amendment I will state that a few days ago, when the amendment of the Senator from New Mexico was pending, I stated that if that amendment was adopted it would be unnecessary to amend the total, because ample funds were provided in the bill to pay the compensation of veterans until the Congress shall meet in January.

The adoption by the Senate of the Connally amendment, however, according to the best information I can secure this afternoon, means an additional amount of $170,000,000. In view of that fact I do not believe it would be wise to let the amount provided in the bill remain. Therefore I have offered this amendment, increasing the amount for pensions by $170,000,000, so that it can go to conference; and if there is any change there the change can be reflected in the total of the bill. I do not believe we should take the chance of having an increase of that amount not provided for in the bill.

I therefore ask the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, as I understand the Senator, the material changes in the bill this afternoon call for another appropriation of $170,000,000.

Mr. BYRNES. What the Senator from Utah understood the Senator from South Carolina to say was that the amendment of the bill calls for $170,000,000. I do not want to open up any more debate on that question, because this bill has been before the Senate so long that the Senator from Oregon was misled into saying that he gave notice of a motion to reconsider on March 31, and it seems to me it has been that long. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from South Carolina.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I have another amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed that the clerks be authorized to correct the totals and section numbers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I desire at this time to call up an amendment which I offered on yesterday.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 39, line 21, it is proposed to strike out "$50,000,000" and to insert "$5,000,000."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND] referred to the matter of ship subsidies. In that connection the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] said just a few minutes ago on the floor that he regarded it as a bad practice to tax the whole people for the benefit of a small group—a proposal with which I am in most hearty agreement.

In order that the Senator from New York might have an opportunity to discuss the matter which was affected by the motion of the Senator from Tennessee, I have offered this amendment to transfer the $45,000,000, which would otherwise go to the payment of ship subsidies, to the veterans' fund provided in this bill. That is the effect of this amendment—to transfer to the veterans of this country $45,000,000 of money which otherwise would go to shipping lines in the payment of ship subsidies. If that can be accomplished, I think we will be doing something distinctly worth while.

I do not want to prolong this discussion. I merely wish, for the purpose of the record to have the veterans of this country and the people understand better just what these subsidies mean. I want them to understand that they not only mean the payment of a vast sum every year out of the Treasury for hauling a little mail, but they also mean the virtual gift of hundreds of millions, yes, $2,000,000,000 worth of shipping property to steamship companies in this country for a tiny fraction of its original cost.

There is a suit now pending in the Federal court at Baltimore involving one steamship company that bought five steamships from the United States Government. These steamers cost the Government two and a quarter million dollars apiece. This company bought these steamships under the Jones-White Act for $30,000 apiece, which was approximately one seventieth of their cost to the Government; and if that company never received one penny in ship subsidies, it would have received these beautiful steamers—five of them, for $150,000. That is all in the world it would have had invested in these five steel steamships; and I submit that it is enough for the Government to supply the steamers themselves, at one seventieth of their cost, without supplying the capital to run the vessels afterward.

This particular company is now bringing suit, the pleadings in which case I hold in my hand, demanding that the interest rate on Government loans to it to remodel these steamers shall be reduced from 3 percent to one half of 1 percent per annum. The company was not satisfied with getting two and a quarter millions dollars' worth of Federal property for $30,000; it wants this Government in this dark hour of financial distress and trouble, to loan it money for one half of 1 percent! And this, while our Nation faces grave perils, and has billions of money borrowed from bankers and others on which it is paying 4¼-percent interest.

I have just one more observation. I place this in the RECORD, because I think the people of this country are entitled to know just what this means to the Treasury of the United States.

A steamship company operating from Gulf to Mediterranean ports in 1 year's time received $438,775 for hauling mail which under international postal union rates would otherwise have been hauled for $58.

Another concern down in that part of the country hauled a batch of mail for which it received $789,258.50, while the regular rate under international postal union rates for hauling that mail would have been $1,462.80.

I want the American people to know that they are today making possible huge profits for private corporations at public expense. If there is to be any thrift, any economy, if we are going to cut the pensions of our soldiers, certainly we lack justification for continuing these tremendous subsidies. I am trying to divert this money from wealthy steamship companies, to whom we have virtually given $2,000,000,000 worth of Government propertly for a song, to the disabled soldiers of this country, to whom I believe it justly belongs, if anyone is entitled to it.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BONE. In just a moment.

Our soldiers fought to preserve the very wealth these steamship gentlemen now possess. These boys put uniforms on their backs, shouldered rifles, and went out to fight and die, if need be, to preserve and protect this private wealth. We have not hesitated to take pension money away from our soldiers to give it to the subsidy grabbers. That is the thing against which I rise to protest.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. BONE. I will answer it if I can.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I have sympathy with the policy of denying subsidies to the shipping interests. I was wondering, however, whether the Senator has correctly interpreted the provisions of the bill. It seems to me, from a hasty examination of it, that it does not carry a direct appropriation out of the Treasury, but merely confers upon the Shipping Board authority to use funds which they had accumulated in the operation of Government ships. If it is a direct appropriation, I would support a motion to strike it out; but if it is merely an authorization to utilize funds on hand which have been earned through the operation of Government vessels, then another question is presented. I shall be glad to be informed as to the facts in this matter.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, will the Senator from Washington yield to me in that connection?

Mr. BONE. I yield.

Mr. COPELAND. As a matter of fact, the item which the Senator has mentioned in his amendment relates to a theoretical sum of $50,000,000. In the appropriation act for the fiscal year 1930 we set up the sum of $50,000,000 for the expenses of the Shipping Board, to operate the ships which we had not yet sold. As a matter of fact, let me say in all kindness to my friend from Washington, there is not $50,000,000 in this fund. The amount in the fund at this moment is $14,461,000. The $50,000,000 was the sum set up in 1930, and we have used that up operating these ships. We talk about the subsidies we give to the great shipping lines. On those which we operate ourselves we have wasted now, if you want to use that word, $36,000,000 in operating our own ships, but we have not sold them at all at $2 a ton or $200 a ton. So let me say to my friend from Washington that, much as I would like to help the veterans—and I would like to help them, not $50,000,000, but two or three times that amount—we cannot get blood out of a turnip, and we cannot get $45,000,000 out of $14,000,000, and there is no $50,000,000 there available for this purpose or for any other purpose.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I will occupy the floor just a moment longer. I do not know the purpose of the committee in appearing to make available $50,000,000 if the money was not there.

The Senator in charge of the bill has just advised me that there was $14,000,000 in the fund. It makes no difference, however, if there is only $14,000,000, I object as a matter of principle to a private steamship company getting that sum instead of the veterans, when the soldier needs it so badly in these tragic times.

If the Senator will look at page 41, he will find there a reappropriation of the unexpended balance of the appropriation of $10,000,000 made to operate lines of ships which have been taken back or may be taken back. I think perhaps that is one of the things the Senator from New York referred to.

Mr. COPELAND. Let me say, if the Senator will permit me, that this reappropriation was made in order that technically whatever money had been unexpended might be used and added to the fund. But let me assure the Senator that the amount of money in this operating fund, not for private shipping, not for the subsidizing of ships which we have sold, but this money cited on page 39, is for the care and operation and the expenses of our own shipping lines, not those which we have sold to other people. If the Senator wishes to find $45,000,000 to aid the veterans—and I should like to find that much to aid them—he cannot find it here. As a matter of fact, we have appropriated, if I remember, only about $25,000,000 for the ship-subsidy work, and that is in another bill entirely, not in this one. While it looks as if, on the face of it, they could expend not to exceed $50,000,000, as a matter of fact that is the language of the appropriation bill for the fiscal year 1930, and the amount of money in that fund is only about $14,000,000.

Mr. BONE. The position of the Senator from New York, reduced to its simplest terms, seems to be this: That there is something tragic in the people of this country retaining possession of their own property and operating it at a possible loss, but a similar loss becomes sanctified when we virtually give this property away to a private corporation, and that private corporation comes to the Congress and says, "We cannot operate the property you have given us without a loss, and Uncle Sam must make up the difference." We blithely and gaily make up the difference, and think that sort of practice is all right.

If the Government has to give its property away and then make up the losses of a private corporation, which is the beneficiary of such wonderful generosity, it would have been the part of wisdom to have kept the property. We virtually give these Government ships away, and now the private steamship companies want the Government to not only keep the ships running for them but virtually underwrite losses by extravagant subsidies.

The largest private business enterprises have been coming down to Congress and asking that body to underwrite business and guarantee its financial success. If the Government underwrites all forms of private business, private business should not object to the Government entering some forms of business, as it has in the Muscle Shoals development. If private capital wants to enjoy a monopoly of the business field, it should stand on its own bottom and not bleed the country in taxes to cover its losses.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Washington.

The amendment was rejected.

WHAT IS TO HAPPEN TO THE UNDERSTANDING OF A UNANIMOUS CONGRESS?

Mr. LONG. Mr. President, I am informed today that the President has been advised by the Treasury Department not to allow the bill which passed the Senate for the relief of the banks of the country to be approved by the conferees of the House and the Senate. That is, that the provision we put into the law stipulating that the guaranty bank fund was to be participated in by the State banks just as by the Federal Reserve banks must come out of the measure; and that, instead of the Vandenberg amendment, which provides that the State banks shall be admitted, guaranteeing deposits up to $2,500 until the permanent guaranty fund is to take effect, the President's advisers have insisted that there be written into the measure a provision that the State banks shall participate in the benefits only upon having been admitted through the certificate of the board containing a member of the Federal Reserve Board, the balance of them to be appointed by the President.

Mr. President, that is the information I get, which I think is pretty reliable. In fact, I am more than sure it is reliable, and what does that mean?

I was not going to support the Glass banking bill in the Senate when it was here for consideration, but when the Senator from Michigan came to me with his amendment, which we call "the Vandenberg amendment", showing that the State banks were going to be given a chance and fair treatment, I was willing to swallow some of the provisions of the Glass bill, which I had not accepted before, in order to get a reasonable protection for the banks and more protection for the depositors of the little banks in the States.

I want to say that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] kept faith with what I had understood. The Senator from Virginia accepted that amendment on the floor of the Senate, and it was adopted.

I happen to know that the amendment was satisfactory to the people in charge of the bill in the House. I happen to know that the Senator from Virginia went a long way in the matter, particularly in having shown not only senatorial preferment toward this kind of a settlement of the matter, but even in his grand personal conduct toward myself and the efforts which I made to rush the bill along in an evening session.

Mr. President, if, in trying to bring this country out of the rough, we have the Treasury Department of this country overturning what was the consensus of all the minds in the Senate and the House on this banking question, all our effort comes to naught. After all this effort to get a constructive banking law for this country, after all of that, it comes to naught, all because of the advisers in the Treasury Department. I do not know who they are, probably the Secretary of the Treasury, the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, and possibly somebody else, though I do not know who else. I am not in on any conference. I never confer in such meetings. To begin with, I am not expected. It has always been my policy, instead of participating in conferences, to take instructions from conferees and try to follow along.

If this kind of a worked-out proposition which we had hoped after a year's work here was going to produce a compromise and give solidity to a credit structure throughout this country is going to be upset—as I understand efforts now are afoot to upset this agreement by the preemptory pronunciamentos given to the conferees in both Houses—then there is no use of having legislation going through here at all. What is the use of all the work if some midnight or 6 o'clock or 9 o'clock or 4 o'clock pronouncement given from the White House as the result of advice is going to upset it all? There is no need of trying to have legislation at all to create a balanced structure. We need the Glass bill in some respects, but what does this bill mean now if they strike out our amendment?

I want to say with every feeling of kindness that I owe every compliment that I can pay to the Senator from Virginia for his magnanimous support here in accepting the Vandenberg amendment, and I feel that we owe a great debt to the Senator from Michigan for his effort to bring about this situation. I know the attitude of the members of the Committee on Banking and Currency in the House, and it is the feeling of the two committees of the two Houses, it is almost the unanimous opinion of the Membership of the Senate and of the Membership of the House, that we should have our amendment; and in spite of all that and all the work that has been done, now we are to have the whole thing upset and the bill brought back with our amendment cut out, so that the bill, from our standpoint, will be worse than if we had no legislation at all.

Mr. President, what is to come in here? If they try to put in a guaranty bank fund for the national banks or the Federal Reserve banks and leave out of that guaranty bank fund the State banks, it will break 95 percent of the State banks in the United States within 3 months' time, if not 100 percent.

If we so legislate here as to allow the State banks to be left out—and I say "left out" advisedly—if we do not succeed in having the so-called "Vandenberg amendment" finally adopted; if we legislate in such a way as to leave the State banks out of the guaranty fund, after we have once voted them in, and, on the other hand, leave the member banks of the Federal Reserve System in the guaranty fund, everybody knows that every dollar of money is going to be deposited in the banks the solvency of which the Government has guaranteed.

Let me tell the Senate what has been done in this country, Mr. President. Early in March, shortly after President Roosevelt went into office, we managed to pass a law under which all the banks could be admitted if the Federal Reserve Board saw fit to pass them for admission. Now I want to tell what was done. They went down to my State of Louisiana and excluded from their list one or two, or perhaps a half dozen of the strongest banks we had in the country. I was in position to know the status of some of those banks from their reports. Mr. President, they excluded one bank as to the solvency of which, if they had permitted it to open, there would never have been any question; it would have continued in business, and if the country was liquidated it could have liquidated. But after excluding that bank, and others like it, they went up to another place in Louisiana and opened a national bank that had a State branch bank. That State bank was so insolvent that it looked like it would wreck the whole country down there to keep it open. The only reason the State bank had not been closed was because it looked as if it might be held solvent by reason of the connection it had with the national bank. It was a most pitiful picture of a bank that we knew anything about.

Right across the river, in Mississippi, was a bank to which we had furnished every kind of assistance in the world to keep it from closing its doors, but, lo and behold, when they got ready, just because it had a national bank charter they opened up that bank over across the line in Mississippi, although they are never going to be able to keep it open unless they pour every dollar they have into it. They opened up that other such bank in Louisiana too; they opened up a bank concerning which I have such a report that there is not a man in the Senate who will say they had any right under the rules which they had prescribed to open it; and they have kept closed other banks in the State, although, from the record, there is not any comparison between their solvency and the solvency of some of the banks they have opened.

The other day one of the strongest banks in the South came here to get admitted to the Federal Reserve System. It is one of the strongest banks there is anywhere in the United States, and is located at Shreveport, La. After they had examined the bank, somebody in the Federal Reserve bank of Dallas district, said they thought they ought to put $200,000 more capital in it and they agreed to do it. They got up here to Washington after the Dallas bank had approved the plan, and the next thing I knew they wanted about $950,000.

I ascertained sufficient about the situation to know that it was practically almost impossible to get through the webwork so that a State bank might secure admission into the Federal Reserve System at all; and yet, because there was a national bank in Vicksburg and there was a State bank branch of a national bank in another place in Louisiana, they saw fit to pull them in and try to hold them open and breathe whatever life they could into them.

I am not complaining, Mr. President, for the banks. We cannot possibly make this country solvent unless we can give people confidence in the banks. We cannot close all the State banks in this country. If we enact a law guaranteeing deposits in Federal Reserve banks, but not taking in the State banks, without any question, it is going to mean the closing of the State banks; it is going to mean that we will have guaranteed and unguaranteed bank deposits, and the people are going to try to take their money out of those not guaranteed and put it in banks that are guaranteed.

Can they pull them out of banks that are not guaranteed? No. Why? Because we have only about $7,000,000,000 worth of currency in the United States, and the State banks have probably $20,000,000,000 worth of deposits, and, at the very most, they might get three or four billion dollars out of the State banks, their part of the currency, to put into the supposed-to-be guaranteed bank system. We will create a crisis if we undertake to guarantee a certain list of Federal Reserve banks and not guarantee the State banks; we will bring on a banking crisis that will be worse than the banking crisis we had on the 4th day of March. It is not physically possible to keep a banking structure afloat in this country by guaranteeing half of them and not guaranteeing the other half. It is just not possible to do it. It is going to mean that everybody is going to try to draw his money out of the unguaranteed bank and put it in the bank that is guaranteed.

Now, who is advising the President in this matter? If this were the demand of the Senator from Virginia, I would have to take a back seat; if it were the demand of Mr. STEAGALL, the Chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee of the other House, I would have to take a back seat; if it were the demand of the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], the Chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee of the Senate, I would take a back seat; but it is not their demand. Who is passing judgment, Mr. President, on this matter. The Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. William H. Woodin, is passing judgment on the matter; the Treasury Department is passing judgment. Mr. STEAGALL agrees—O.K.; the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] agrees—fine; the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] comes in with an amendment—O.K.; the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] voted for the amendment; the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY], the leader on the Republican side, voted for the amendment; even I voted for the amendment and for the bill. But a voice stopped it all. What sort of opposition is there to it? Mr. Woodin, with his name freshly painted in the list J. P. Morgan & Co., buying stock for $20 which I was offered, as a sucker, for $37—and there were plenty of suckers, but I was not one of them for I learned my lesson in earlier days—Mr. Woodin, whose name adorns the list and, I understand, the assistant of Mr. Woodin advise against us.

I started to oppose the confirmation of Mr. Woodin's assistant because it looked to me like a family matter; but on further reflection I went to a ball game and let it go over and said no more about it. It would not have made any difference anyway, and I just put myself on record and decided I would let the Senators vote for the confirmation of the balance of the family, and I would get what pleasure I could by watching a ball game between Washington and Cleveland in the American League. I probably ought to have stayed here because, well—at any rate, I made no further opposition, and the gentleman was confirmed. I do not think he is in the category of those competent for the job. He has had no financial experience, but there was some competency shown by the record. It was shown that he was a member of a firm of attorneys representing J. P. Morgan and Charley Mitchell here in the Capital, and that was proof of some competency. That and other similar matters came out in the hearing, and it was apparent that this kind of appointment could not be disturbed except for strong presumptive or actual proof to the contrary at least.

So Woodin, Morgan's preferred client and Morgan's local attorney practicing in the Treasury Department, neither one of them with any experience whatever that ought to stand up against the kind of men that are here in the Senate and in the House, is going to wreck our bill.

So now they come out. It does not make any difference, Mr. President. I would have thought in days like these, with the Secretary of the Treasury going around asking whether he ought to resign or not, he would let us alone here. I know he has been asking advice of people as to what he ought to do, whether he ought to stay there or get out. He did not ask me, but I advised him without his asking me. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order, and this admonition applies to the galleries.

Mr. LONG. I would have thought, Mr. President, with this gentleman going around asking Senators what he ought to do, apparently wanting to know from authority that he thought reliable, whether he ought to stay there or not, that the least thing he would have done would have not to have been setting himself up as an oracle to tell us what we should do about a bill that everybody agreed on and was happy over. I was about to get feeling good over this situation, for the first time—well, not for the first time, perhaps, for it looked like something good was going through here several times, but something always happened.

I do not understand this thing. There is just something in the way. I remember one time playing in some kind of a game going on in the West in which there was used a pack of cards called "bull dog" playing cards. It seemed like somehow or other the gentlemen who were playing with me could understand something better than I could, and after I got through with the game they happened to leave upon the table the cards with which they played. We got a magnifying glass, and I found that those bull-dog cards, on the back of them, would have the dog with one eye closed on one card and another would have two eyes closed, and one would have one foot up. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate will be in order, and this admonition applies to the galleries.

Mr. LONG. A blind man could have seen, but I could not see, that I did not have a chance in the world in that game; and apparently I do not have a chance in the world in this business; I was living in a false paradise.

I was considering going home and taking up a collection with which to build a monument to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] and the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] and the Chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee of the House [Mr. STEAGALL], feeling that everything was all right and people were going to feel that they were safe; that we were going to have affiliates divorced from private banking houses, which I wanted but confidentially, I had been told by the Chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee in the House that he would strike out the branch-banking provision in conference. I thought I had that much that the Senator from Virginia did not know anything about; that everything was "hunky dory"; but, oh, no.

We are investigating Morgan. Well, we have got him down here investigating him, and lo and behold one little man on his preferred list overrules the Senate and both Houses of Congress.

Investigate him?

Why, a little preferred customer of Morgan has got more power over the banking legislation of the United States than the two Houses of Congress put together.

Investigate him?

Why, Mr. President, we have been fooling ourselves. He turns all of us from the back. He not only saw us coming, but he saw us before we got up. After all we have done on the bill, held here as it had been, he shows us that we are powerless, we are helpless, and nothing of the kind that we figured on is going to be done when the preferred customer and whoever he has got serving with him as Under Secretary speaks and spells the doom of what would have been a solvent banking situation in the United States.

I am told that someone recommends that we had better get Congress to adjourn. Well, Mr. President, so far as I am concerned, I had rather see the Congress adjourn than to see it pass this bill with a guaranty of bank deposits in it at all, unless State banks are included.

I am going to appeal to my friends in the Senate who were for that bill to do one of two things, either to stand up and let the guaranteed-bank-deposit provision stay in the bill as we passed it here, or strike out the guaranteeing of bank deposits altogether. Do not let it go out unless you want to break half the banks with one lick. Do not have a provision to guarantee bank deposits unless you put them all in it. If you are going to provide for admitting State banks after examination here in Washington, just forget all about it. Never mind about putting us in after they investigate. It is too much like the nigger lodge. We know what that investigation means. Unless we are going to be taken in just like the balance of them, then there is no need whatever for it.

I want to ask the Senator from Michigan and the Senator from Virginia not to let this provision, that puts the State banks in that are open on the certificate of the State commission, be taken out of that bill unless they take it all out, and if they take it all out I will still be for the bill and let it go. But we are getting along; we are getting along somehow, in some way. There is nothing so much the matter with the little banks as there is with the country. When we broke our country, we broke our banks. When our land that raises cotton has no value, then our mortgage on the land that raised the cotton was not worth anything, and therefore the bank's loan was not good. When we could not sell our cotton, then our mortgage on the cotton was not worth much, and so the bank's loan on the cotton was not worth much. When we could not sell our timber, then our mortgage on the timberland was not worth much, and then the bank's loan on that was not worth much either.

It will be found, if we look up the little banks in the country, that all they have is what would have been absolutely good if America had been going along all right. They would have been all right. True, we bought too many things that they sent down from some of the big banks. We would have been better off without some of them, but we did not have very much of them. They were sold mostly in other States, and I sympathize with them.

I hope we will know where we are. I hope the Senators from Michigan and Virginia will help, though I do not know how much they feel they are obligated to help out in this matter. I know the Senator from Michigan said to me that the Senator from Virginia told him that if the President of the United States said he would not sign the bill with his amendment in it, he would have to back off of it. I had understood that. I hope I am not violating anything that anybody told me. I felt if the Senator from Virginia accepted the amendment and we all voted for it and the Members of the House voted for it, we would not have any trouble. Highly as I regarded the President of the United States, I felt that if we had the consent of the Senator from Virginia and the committee in the House and the two leaders of the parties in this body and the other House, it would be all right, particularly with my own consent thrown in so as not to unbalance anything. [Laughter.] But if we are going to have this bill passed as it is said to be passed, we might as well quit trying to do anything in the affair.

How long are we going to have Mr. Woodin here, Mr. President? How long is he going to stay here? Why have not these Senators to whom he has been appealing for advice tell him what he should do? I say "Senators." I only know of one point-blank to whom he has gone, but I suppose he has gone to others. Why has he not taken the advice he received and gotten out of office? Why ought he to be staying here telling us what to do about these banks? Why cannot we get the thing fixed up while Congress is in session and get a good banking law that is pleasing to every one of us? Have we got to continue this thing? Is he going to stay here all the time and be as hard to get rid of as Eugene Meyer was? We tried to get them out by the plan of inviting them out, but they still stayed. [Laughter.] We could not get them out with a crowbar. [Laughter.] We are down now to a corkscrew, trying to take them out a piece at a time. [Laughter.] We manage to move one or two a little bit. But lo and behold they are like a moccasin snake in the days of the fall—more dangerous than ever.

I want to say, and I will take the responsibility for this statement, that if they will let our bill go through just as it left the Senate we will see that it will do more to revive conditions in the United States than everything we have done since I have been here. If they will let that bill alone and keep their head out of it, if they will not come in here and make a mess of it, but let it go on the books as we passed it, it will do more to reestablish this country than everything we have done since I have been here. It will do more than the inflation bill, because it is inflation and a very good kind of inflation, the very best kind—bank credit. It is the kind of inflation that means solid banks the people will trust, and we can have $1,250,000,000,000 worth of bank checks interchanged in this country in normal times again, because the people will not be afraid of the banks, and that is more and better inflation, that will do more good than everything else we have done all put together.

I wish the President would take my advice just one time. He has taken it once or twice, and probably regrets I gave it now. [Laughter.] I say he has taken it. He probably only did the way he intended to do all the time and probably just told me that, but I felt good over it. [Laughter.] I wish he would take my advice one more time, just one more time. I wish for one time in his life, until I get on Morgan's list, he would take my advice. I am going to learn how to get on their list if I stay here much longer. I am going to read the reports and find out what we have done, as Mr. Will Rogers says.

I wish the President would take my advice one time and let us alone. I wish he would take the combined advice of the banking authorities of the two Houses of Congress and the practically unanimous opinion of the two Houses of Congress just one time. I wish he would take the advice of the people in the Congress who have been working over the case for 2 years—and there are some of us who have given most of our time to it for at least the last year—and let us alone. We have this thing worked out where we would have solvent banks. We would not have to close four fifths of the banks in order to guarantee one fifth of them.

But they will not let us alone. They will not let the bill have a chance to go through. We have to have it go into some kind of a situation to be controlled by men whose only financial learning in their lives has come through such associations as they have had through being on the preferred list of J. P. Morgan & Co. That is all they know. The best they could do would be to send their men down and let us talk to them a while. They seem to be men who have the right to decide this case and overrule both Houses of Congress, and we do not even get a chance to talk to them. They come from other realms. It is a terrible thing to be hung by a judge who does not even give us a chance to have a hearing, but that is the situation we are up against. They do not let us plead in our own rights there even before Morgan's clients.

OUR FEET ARE SORE AND WE ARE WEARY

But the fact that we have agreed on the bill is apparently prima facie evidence that the bill ought not to be passed.

What kind of a Congress have we? I say a wonderful Congress, a great Congress of great men.

But what kind of a Congress have we, gentlemen of the jury? [Laughter.]

What kind of a Congress have we?

What does Congress mean? I was not surprised at my friend from Texas [Mr. CONNALLY] when he said that if we did not do what the Veterans' Administration wanted we probably would not have any bill at all. I was not surprised. But here we had agreed on a bill after a year of study and everybody was happy over it. When I wrote back to my people in Louisiana the night the Glass bill went out of the Senate and told them what was in the Glass bill, it was just like breathing new life into them. I know how they are going to feel when they hear what is going to happen to it now.

What kind of a Congress have we? What is the use of staying here any longer? What is the use of doing anything? What is the use of Representatives and Senators studying up on these questions? What boots it how long we study and how much or how little we know about it, or how much we try to learn about it before we vote? It does not amount to a thing on the living earth. It will not even rattle as much as one shot in a gourd. It does not amount to anything.

The only time a vote counted for anything was during the Louderback trial. That was the only time they did not have a chance to annul our vote. I would not have been surprised if the day after the Louderback case was closed we had got an order from somebody to have Judge Louderback impeached. That would have been just about as constitutional as two thirds of the things we have passed since I have been here. The Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], my learned and beloved chief, knows that himself. It could not have been a bit different.

This is the kind of procedure we are having, and here we are letting this bill go back and be scissored up, letting it be clipped by a man who has been around here with one of his underlings asking Senators whether he ought to stay in office or not, and yet he is staying there long enough to blast the only hope we ever had of building up a good banking system in the United States.

Mr. President, what I say may not do a bit of good in the world. It probably will not do any good, but I want to put myself on record in the Senate. When we passed the sapling bill [laughter]—I believe they call it the reforestation bill, though—but whatever we call it, when the sapling bill was passed I said to the Senate that there was going to be more scandal in the administration of that act than in everything that had been passed before that time. They did not even get started before some of the Government agents got mixed up over the shaving kits, and now they are all blaming each other for having given the order. They could not even buy shaving soap without getting into a scandal before they had hardly started. [Laughter.] They got into a row over that.

We read in the paper that one man has a radio contract to speak every Sunday night over the radio and tell the people what they shall do the next week. My friend the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST] has been here some twenty-odd years, but if he is here twenty-odd years more they will not hire him to speak over the radio because he does not know what is going to happen next week. [Laughter.] But some man comes down here who was on the inside, and in order that Senators may know what we are going to do next week, they are gracious enough to hire a radio speaker at a thousand dollars a week to talk to us 15 minutes of time each week, in order that Members of the House and Senate may know what they are going to do when they reassemble the following week or maybe in the fall.

We had expert advice of every kind and character, but what does the Congress amount to? I have not only told about the sapling bill and how it has already been proven that it will involve scandal, but I have told the Senate other things. We will have more scandal out of the administration of that law than we ever heard of out of anything else. Then what? By the time they get through fixing it up about this little kit business, we will see what else may come out of that business.

That is not the half of it. If you had that much to cut off a set of whiskers [laughter], you wait and see how much trouble you are going to have a little later, before you get through with the administration of that act.

That is not all I voted against here. I voted against the economy bill. I am proud of that. I think everybody here knows that we made a mistake in passing that bill. You proved that this evening, when you voted to undo $170,000,000 of it. You have already proved, in your opinion, this afternoon, that I was right in voting against the economy bill. Only about five of us on the Democratic side of the Chamber voted against the economy bill, and we were proved to be right here today. We will be proved to be right time and again as we go along in the administration of that act and these other measures; and, Mr. President, I would have voted against the farm bill if inflation had not been put in it. I had previously announced on the floor of the Senate that I was going to vote against the farm bill.

It was said that we were going to inflate. Here is how we were really going to inflate. There has been a better feeling in the country. We have not done much inflating; but in the spring of the year we have come along here and told everybody that commodity prices are going up, and the farmers are planting every field full of cotton where they can find a place to plow. Right in the spring of the year we said, "There will be no more 5-cent cotton. It is going to 10 or 15 cents", and the farmers pulled out every old plow and every old mule and every old horse they had and they have gone in at the corner of every rail fence they could find in every corner of this country, and they have planted cotton where they never made a stalk grow before in their lifetime, because "good times are coming." That is so, whether you gentlemen know it or not. I have been back home and looked around. I know where they did not plant cotton before and I see it planted now. You are going to find out that they are going to piddle around with this kind of confidence that they have put in the minds of some of these people, and by the time you get another fourteen or fifteen or sixteen million bale crop here you will have to make the dollar worth a penny on the dollar, or that cotton will be selling for 3 cents a pound.

Just remember what I am telling you. I have not told you anything here yet that has not come true. Remember what I am telling you about the way the farm bill is being administered. I know what I am talking about. It takes a little while to prove it, but just wait until I get back here next winter and you come back here and you will find out how true it is going to be.

I got the statistics about these things. There have been a few more men employed, yes; but what is that going to amount to? We still have over 12,000,000 unemployed. A lot of people opened up sawmills, cutting lumber on confidence. There are a few things moving around. Confidence? I want to tell you, Mr. President, that it is not going to be possible to keep the thing going with fictions and with sermons. It cannot be kept going in that way. If we do not stabilize this banking situation as it can be stabilized, the chance of the "new deal" is going to be killed aborning. It will never get away from the post when the people try to draw out the billions of dollars we have in this country in the State banks to put in the guaranteed ones. They cannot draw it out of the banks, because there is not a fourth as much currency in the United States as there are State deposits; and whether it is a fair thing to do or the right thing to do or not, if we do not stabilize and solidify and make solvent the banking situation, we are never going to be able to get away from the post.

Remember what I am telling you. There is no need of my saying any more. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] started two or three times to rise to speak, and I meant to quit long before this. I meant to speak only a few minutes; but I do appeal to the men of the Senate who are in the confidence of the President. Except during election time, I cannot stay in the confidence of anybody that runs for big office. The only time they ever use me, Mr. President, is when it comes to getting votes, and not always then; but I have always been pretty well accepted in the party councils during vote-getting time, most of the time. I am sorry that I did not take advantage of that season of the year to say more; but I did not take much time for that during those days. I talked to the candidate less than 15 or 20 minutes by myself at any one time. But there are men in the Senate whose superior learning and counsel over me gives them a standing at the White House; and I want to ask them not to let the President make this mistake. I beg this favor. I want to ask them, at a time when we can save the situation, not to let anyone meddle with the bank bill any more.

We have fought over this thing long enough. We know a whole lot more about it than these other people do. We know a whole lot more about it than they ever will know about it. I do not want the conferees hamstrung so that they cannot do what they want to do, regardless of how they may feel. I do appeal to the leaders of the two big parties here, and the men in charge of financial legislation here, to try to prevail upon the President, now that we have gotten together on this bank bill, not to deal it a deathblow and make it ineffective.

I thank the Senate.

INDEPENDENT OFFICES APPROPRIATIONS

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H.R. 5389) making appropriations for the Executive Office and sundry independent executive bureaus, boards, commissions, and offices for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1934, and for other purposes.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, last Tuesday, I believe, the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES], in charge of the bill, offered an amendment to strike out section 8, on page 58. That section was stricken out without any explanation, and I think there were only a few Senators on the floor at the time. It authorizes the President to furlough officers of the Army, Marine Corps, Public Health Service, Coast Guard, or Coast and Geodetic Survey.

As I understand, at the present time the President has authority to furlough officers of the Navy. This section would give him authority to furlough more officers. It has been stated by prominent generals in the Army that there could well be furloughed at least 2,000 officers out of the 12,000 that we have at the present time. Their average pay, as I understand, is about $6,000 a year. This section will cut them down to half pay. It will make a saving of about $6,000,000 in the Army alone.

I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which Section 8 was stricken out may be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I object to the request for unanimous consent; but I think I can satisfy the Senator as to the reasons why the action was taken.

The purpose of the section referred to was to enable the President to furlough officers at half pay. In the committee there was considerable discussion, and I was directed to make an investigation. The Army officers prefer that they be dismissed from the service rather than that this furlough provision be applied to them. The administration came to the same conclusion. The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] and the Senator from Texas [Mr. SHEPPARD] came before the Appropriations Committee and expressed the views of the Military Affairs Committee. It is my own opinion that if officers are not satisfied with the furlough, and prefer to be dismissed from the service, whenever they can be dismissed, it will be well to let the 2,000 be dismissed, if that be determined, instead of furloughing them.

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, under the provisions of the bill, the furloughed men would get half salary, which would amount, on the average, to about $3,000 a year. It is hard for anyone to believe that officers would rather be discharged from the service or retired at a smaller salary than to be furloughed for half their present salary. As the objection to reconsideration is made, however, I hope the conferees of the Senate at least will not insist too hard upon having the Senate amendment agreed to by the House conferees, because I think it is absolutely unfair; and I am satisfied that if the matter had come to a fair vote on the floor of the Senate that section would not have been stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the Senator from South Carolina objects to the request for reconsideration made by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. BYRNES. I do, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, the bill is still before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I have a short amendment which I desire to propose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Florida will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 42, line 15, it is proposed to strike out "$18,000" and insert "$13,500."

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, this amendment involves a salary of $18,000 especially provided in this bill. I suppose the officer is already in the position in the Fleet Corporation, which has been transferred to the Shipping Board.

I have followed out the policy of the Senate in dealing with veterans, and I propose a 25 percent cut in that $18,000 salary. I think it certainly comes within a similar scope, and if the Senate thinks veterans should be cut as much as 25 percent we should deal with an $18,000 salary in the same way. I am really opposed to leaving it at $13,500. It is $18,000 at the present time.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. TRAMMELL. I yield.

Mr. BYRNES. If the Senator will yield for that purpose, I desire to move to strike out the paragraph for this reason:

Under the Economy Act it is provided that no salary shall be in excess of $10,000 except in a case where an employee of the Shipping Board Merchant Fleet Corporation is now receiving more than $12,500, and in such case the salary hereafter shall be $12,500. Others are limited; and because several salaries are provided for in this paragraph I want to move to strike it out, so that it can go to conference, and find why the House inserted the language of this paragraph.

I therefore move, as a substitute, to strike out lines 11 to 16 on page 42.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, the chairman of the committee no doubt is correct. I have not looked up the matter. I am a little apprehensive, however, that under his motion a great number of persons will be allowed to receive a $12,500 salary. Under the paragraph as it stands they are limited to $10,000, except three.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I happen to know that situation, and I know there is not the slightest danger of that happening. The purpose of the Economy Act was to limit the Shipping Board or Merchant Fleet salaries to $12,500.

Mr. TRAMMELL. I am very glad the chairman of the committee agrees with me that that should be stricken out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from South Carolina to the amendment of the Senator from Florida.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is still before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I understand that the Senator from Oregon [Mr. STEIWER] has an amendment to offer.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 53, line 8, after the word "hereby", it is proposed to insert:

Upon giving 60 days' notice and opportunity for public hearing to the parties to such contract.

Mr. STEIWER. Mr. President, a little earlier in the afternoon the Senate refused a reconsideration of the vote by which section 6 had been stricken from the bill. There is now no opportunity for further consideration on the general question of striking out the paragraph. It is a part of the bill by the action of the Senate. The only purpose of the amendment which I have now sent to the desk is to provide that before the President shall exercise the power to modify or cancel he shall give notice to the contracting parties and permit them opportunity for hearing.

Mr. BYRNES. Mr. President, I accept that amendment. I think it is fair.

Mr. STEIWER. I thank the Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oregon.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I am glad the Senator from South Carolina has accepted the amendment; but I want to say two or three words more on this subject of shipping, even though the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] intimated that I had made the same speech a hundred times. I have not made the speech as many times as the Senator from Utah has complained about the appropriations carried in the individual appropriation bills; but there have been so many misstatements in the RECORD about the shipping business that I desire to insert a letter regarding it.

On the 31st of May, at page 4645 of the RECORD, the Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] made certain criticisms regarding the salary paid the head of one of the shipping lines. I want the truth about that matter to appear; and I ask that the letter received by me from Mr. Franklin D. Mooney, president of the New York & Cuba Mail Steamship Co., may be inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

NEW YORK & CUBA MAIL STEAMSHIP CO.,
Washington, D.C., June 1, 1933.

Hon. ROYAL S. COPELAND,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR COPELAND: I happened to arrive in Washington this morning to keep an appointment, and while here my attention was called to certain statements made by Senator BLACK on the floor of the Senate in connection with the salary paid the president of the New York & Cuba Mail Steamship Co. As I happen to be the president of that company, I naturally am quite familiar with the amount that is paid. I am sure Senator BLACK would not wish the RECORD to set forth statements which are not borne out by the facts, and with a view to enabling you to correct a wrong impression that can easily be created by what was put in the RECORD, I desire to submit the following facts.

The New York & Cuba Mail Steamship Co. does not now and at no time has it paid me a sum as great as the minimum fixed in the so-called "Black amendment." At the present time, the New York & Cuba Mail Steamship Co. pays me an annual salary of $12,825, and the expenses incurred by me for a period covering from 1929 to 1932 have never been in excess of $1,100 per annum, which covers from one to three trips annually to Cuba and to Mexico, railroad fares, hotels, taxis, telephone calls, etc. For the same period fees paid to me for attendance at directors' meetings have never exceeded $220 per annum.

Senator BLACK made reference yesterday to some low rates of interest charged by the Shipping Board on construction loans. Inasmuch as he had just previously mentioned the name of the New York & Cuba Mail Steamship Co., it might be inferred that such loans were made to that company. In order that no such impression may be created, I desire to state to you that while loans were made by the Shipping Board in connection with the construction of the steamers Oriente and Morro Castle, the rates of interest which applied on such loans were 2⅞ percent and 2⅜ percent. Of course, you know these rates of interest apply only while the vessels are engaged in the foreign trade and that for any period of time that they would engage in a domestic trade, the rate of interest would be 5¼ percent.

While passing through Washington, I thought it might be desirable to give you these facts in case you wish to correct the Senate RECORD.

Very truly yours,

FRANKLIN D. MOONEY, President.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, I want to call attention also to the fact that the shipping industry employs 75,000 men, not counting those employed in offices and agencies in the interior of the country. So, when we talk about destroying the shipping lines and criticizing them because they cost money to operate, we are seeking to destroy one of the greatest employers of labor in all the industrial life of our country.

Mr. President, this afternoon I heard statements made about the wickedness of subsidizing American shipping. I heard the Senator from Utah talk about how the shipping of other countries could be carried on, and how successful that shipping was. There is not a country on the face of the earth that has any shipping industry or any merchant marine that does not subsidize that merchant marine. If we are willing in this country to repeal the La Follette Acts, and let our seamen work under the same conditions under which seamen on foreign ships work, the same conditions under which the Chinese coolies are employed, we can maintain an American merchant marine, but if we are to maintain the high standards of American labor, such as we desire to maintain in the United States, we will have to subsidize our American merchant marine, just as the shipping lines of other countries are subsidized and assisted.

Mr. President, I know how useless it is to talk about this matter. I am distressed beyond words that the Democratic Party should be responsible for the ultimate destruction of the American merchant marine. It will not look well in the future when we find out that the shipping lines of our country, which were assisted during the administrations of the Republican Party, are now no longer to be assisted. That will not redound to the glory of the Democratic Party.

I wanted to say that last word, because I am satisfied, as I told the shipping interests recently, that there is no use making any further appeal to this body. The Senate has determined, apparently, upon a course which will mean the destruction of these lines, and there will be thrown back upon our country about $200,000,000 worth of ships. Then the time will come, may I say to my friend from Washington, that in the operating fund, if we are still operating the ships, there will be millions far in excess of the fifty million which he thought could be found in the fund, because if we are to operate these lines as Government lines we will appropriate every year probably fifty or one hundred million dollars in excess of what we appropriate now.

Mr. President, what I have said I have said in perfect good feeling. It is the right of every Senator to vote his convictions, and if Senators have voted their convictions and are willing to have this great burden placed upon the American merchant marine, already only 2 knots ahead of the sheriff, that is for the Senate to decide; but I am frank to say that we have made today a very great mistake, and one which, in the language of the Senator from Louisiana, we will come to regret.

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I merely want to say one word in answer to the Senator from New York. I think it is rather a remarkable spectacle when steamship companies can get subsidies of from five thousand to one hundred thousand dollars a pound for hauling mail in boats given to them for a song. These subsidies in themselves are sufficient to amortize the whole investment, including remodeling loans, and yet the companies claim they cannot make a success of the thing. How much do they want out of our depleted Treasury?

I want to say to the Senator from New York that, while I do not know whether it is true as to the eastern lines, if we go to the boats on the west coast we will find Chinese and Filipinos working on them. Filipinos are brought over here to take jobs which ought to go to Americans, and these steamship companies are being subsidized out of the Treasury of the United States to keep these Filipinos on the pay rolls. Not long ago a ship came to your east coast under lease with a Chinese crew of over a hundred members. The picture is not a pleasant one.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the amendments be ordered engrossed and the bill read the third time?

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time and passed.

ABANDONMENT OF THE GOLD STANDARD—STATEMENT BY SENATOR METCALF

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, the Providence Journal, in the issue of May 30, 1933, contained an informative and interesting statement by the able senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. METCALF] on the abandonment of the gold standard, and I ask unanimous consent to have the statement printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

The question of what shall be the basis for our money has been before this country almost from the beginning of the Government. There have been times when the havoc of war or disruptions in the flow of commerce have turned the thoughts of our statesmen to problems of monetary change. In the past 3 months we have witnessed the abandonment of the gold standard as a temporary economic expedient. But now we are asked to remove permanently the foundation of our currency and to break faith with the people of the United States and foreign holders of our bonds by repudiating an honorable contract.

CHARGES REPUDIATION

It has been the unwavering adherence to public faith that has made the credit of this Government as good as the gold which guaranteed it. Even at the time of the Civil War, when the very existence of the Union was threatened, the Government fought against staining its honor by repudiation of its contract. The statesmen of that day who sought to destroy the sanctity of the public pledge have never completely removed the stigma of their acts. In 1894 President Cleveland unflinchingly fought to maintain the honor of his country and preserve the sacred integrity of the Government.

We have had every reason to believe that the acts of the administration since the 4th of March have been temporary and of emergency character. We have been assured that an inflationary program, cautiously inaugurated and carefully controlled, was a part of the war against a temporary world depression. Why, then, if a carefully controlled and little-used inflationary power is to be exerted, are we now asked to enact into law this complete destruction of the gold monetary basis? Why are we virtually commanded by the Executive to repudiate an honest debt, and to dishonor a contract of the United States Government? What is the real reason for this bill? I think that question will remain unanswered; that is, unless some of the academics who are using this Government as an experimental laboratory will prepare a thesis in reply.

With three and a half billions of the world's gold held by the Government; with a record for honorable discharge of public obligations unstained; with the credit of the Government unimpaired, why should we go off the gold standard? The only answer to that question is the bare fact that the sponsors of this measure are intending to transfer property from one group of citizens to another. They intend to assume the role of partitioner of property by dishonoring a contract.

ETHICS REMAIN UNCHANGED

The Constitution of the United States is not a paper idol before which the Government must bow in abject humility, but it has been, and should continue to be, the foundation and the watchlight of our Government. A Government note or a Government bond should be equally sacred. We would not openly repudiate the Constitution, so why should we openly repudiate a constitutional debt?

The problem of the constitutionality of this act is important, but even should the Supreme Court affirm the right of Congress to repudiate a public contract, the affirmation would be only of that right. The decision could in no way relieve the offense against our national honor nor change wrong to right. It would simply affirm the power of the Government to commit an act but would in no way pass upon the justice of that act. It would not affirm the autocratic axiom that "might makes right."

As late as April 23 the Treasury Department borrowed money with the promise to repay in gold or its equivalent. Has the actual value of these borrowed dollars undergone a change? Or is the Government putting itself in the position of borrowing and then refusing to pay in kind? On these late debts there can be no semblance of argument in justification of this bill.

TO PAY WITH CHEAP MONEY

This bill simply means that the Government breaks faith with its creditors and legalizes broken faith in private contracts. It means that debts will be paid in cheapened money. How cheap that money will be, nobody knows. Germany could repay borrowed fortunes with a piece of worthless paper following her program of inflation. Are we to drift in the same direction?

The experience of Germany with currency inflation should be sufficient to demonstrate to the American people the utter fallacy of a movement of this kind. Inflation may mean the issuance of more and more paper money, accepted simultaneously with endlessly rising prices. In other words, the effect of paper inflation would be a reduction in the value of wages and of all sound money.

An increasing price of basic commodities will undoubtedly be accomplished by abandonment of the gold standard and the subsequent inflation. The price of the necessities of life will soar, as will common stocks, a movement already started—that is, they will soar in paper value but not in actual value, as the purchasing power of the dollar decreases, particularly when the actual value is measured in commodities rather than fiat dollars. Following the currency inflation in Germany it took as much as a million marks in paper currency to buy a good meal. The life savings of people were completely wiped out, and the value of insurance policies became virtually nil. It has been admitted by Germans of highest authority that Germany cannot recover from this colossal blunder for 100 years.

FEARS TERRIFIC INFLATION

"The effect of such terrific inflation as may follow this bill may be the complete destruction of our whole financial system. It might easily end in such inflation as that which Germany experienced. In Germany commodity prices and common-stock prices soared. Mortgages and bonded indebtedness, including Government bonds, became worthless. Insurance policies were paid in valueless currency. The cost of living rose so much more rapidly than salaries that factories were forced to pay off twice a day, and even then a day's wages often would not buy a loaf of bread. The savings of people were completely lost, and foreign trade was virtually exterminated by virtue of a complete embargo on importations. Germany was eventually forced to reestablish her currency on a gold basis, but only after a chaotic suffering such as she had never seen before.

"We should not jeopardize our whole financial structure by abandoning our money basis. Such a program is destructive to social progress, and it would retard the natural recovery of this country for many years. We should inaugurate an orderly program of economy and business stimulation, based upon sound credit and confidence. So long as there is in the air the possibility, however remote, of an endless and uncontrolled inflation program, confidence cannot possibly return and business men most assuredly will not jeopardize their future by planning and carrying out elaborate industrial programs. I most sincerely hope that the time will never come when the credit of the United States will be destroyed. Why drive our capital abroad? As Germany did.

"We cannot break faith and retain confidence at the same time."

THE GOLD STANDARD

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House Joint Resolution 192, to assure uniform value to the coins and currencies of the United States.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the joint resolution (H.J.Res. 192) to assure uniform value to the coins and currencies of the United States.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, the nomination of E. Barrett Prettyman, of Maryland, to be General Counsel for the Bureau of Internal Revenue, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I ask unanimous consent that that committee may be discharged from the further consideration of the nomination and that it be referred to the Committee on Finance. I may state, in this connection, that I have discussed the matter with the Chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. ASHURST], and he agrees.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Committee on the Judiciary will be discharged from the further consideration of the nomination, and it will be referred to the Committee on Finance.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. WALSH, from the Committee on Education and Labor, reported favorably the nomination of George F. Zook, of Ohio, to be Commissioner of Education, vice William John Cooper.

Mr. SHEPPARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported favorably sundry nominations in the Army.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Are there further reports of committees? If not, the calendar is in order.

DEPARTMENT OF THE TREASURY

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Thomas Hewes, of Connecticut, to be Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, it is my understanding that on yesterday when this nomination was called there was an agreement that the nomination should go over until Mr. Hewes, the nominee, could appear before the Committee on Finance. I therefore ask that the nomination go over for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The nomination will be passed over.

CUSTOMS SERVICE

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Arthur A. Quinn, of New Jersey, to be comptroller, customs collection district no. 10, New York, N.Y.

Mr. COPELAND. Mr. President, so many questions have been asked me about this appointment that I wish to say a word.

While it is true that the Comptroller of Customs holds an office in New York City, it is a sort of a tradition that the person who holds it shall come from the State of New Jersey. Colonel Foran has made a very acceptable comptroller. He has been there for years, and is very highly thought of; and if his successor will be as good as Colonel Foran has been, I am sure that everybody in New York belonging to the Democratic Party will be very happy. I wanted it to be understood why it is that, while this man appears to hold an office in New York City, as a matter of fact it is the port of New York, and custom is being followed by the appointment of a New Jersey man to the position.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Clement L. West to be collector, customs collection district no. 46, Omaha, Nebr.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of John Bright Hill to be collector, customs collection district no. 15, Wilmington, N.C.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of James J. Connors to be collector, customs collection district no. 31, Juneau, Alaska.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of William Zimmerman, Jr., of Illinois, to be Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

That completes the calendar.

RECESS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock tomorrow.

The motion was agreed to, and (at 6 o'clock and 55 minutes p.m.) the Senate, as in legislative session, took a recess until tomorrow, Saturday, June 3, 1933, at 11 o'clock a.m.

CONFIRMATIONS

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, JUNE 2, 1933

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Heavenly Father, as Thou art so merciful unto us, teach us to be merciful unto others. May we hear and obey the commandment—do unto others as we would have them do unto us. Hasten the day when those jealousies shall cease which have separated nations so long and dashed one upon the other. Grant, our Father, that the citizens of our own land may live intelligent and obedient lives, and that the hearts of our people may more and more cleave together. Blessed Lord God, may a high standard of morality and essential unity live and prevail throughout our entire Nation. Be with any who may be perplexed in business and upon whom care and anxiety are weighing heavily. Hear our prayer and be pleased to give direction to the deliberations of this day, and unto Thee be eternal praise and glory. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 1 minute.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker, it is my purpose at a later date to speak on the subject of the canal across Florida, but this morning I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and present therein a memorial from my legislature to the Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. Speaker and my colleagues, the canal across north Florida is the most important waterway which has been suggested since the construction of the Panama Canal. It, we believe, will handle as much or probably more tonnage than is handled by the Panama Canal and will redound greater benefits to the American people.

The proposed canal across north Florida is by no means a local project, but is decidedly a national project and will benefit every one of the States of the Union and all citizens therein.

This project has been a dream of several generations, but was in a dormant stage until in 1927 I introduced a survey bill which the Congress passed, and then in 1930 it was my pleasure to introduce a further survey bill, which the Congress passed in the general rivers and harbors bill. Under the provisions of this survey bill the Board of Army Engineers are now completing the surveys, and we hope for a favorable report.

During almost each session of the Congress since I have been a Member you have patiently listened to my discussion of this most worthy project, and I trust that the next time I address you upon this subject it may be the last one necessary. It is a project full of merit, and, frankly, I believe the American people, under the able leadership of President Roosevelt, will soon realize the beginning of actual construction of this great waterway improvement.

The people of my State are deeply interested and are offering the Federal Government every possible cooperation. I am glad to now submit the recent memorial of the Florida Legislature urging prompt action upon the project.

The memorial follows:

SENATE COMMITTEE SUBSTITUTE FOR HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION NO. 11—JOINT MEMORIAL OF THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE STATE OF FLORIDA

A memorial to the President of the United States requesting the assistance and cooperation of every available Federal agency in order to make possible at an early date commencement of construction work on a ship canal across the peninsula of the State of Florida

Whereas the construction of a ship canal across the State of Florida will give employment to a vast amount of human labor, thus greatly relieving the distress due to the unemployment crisis, at the same time creating a valuable commercial and military asset which will in the course of time repay its own cost through the collection of reasonable tolls from ships using the canal; and

Whereas the constitution of the State of Florida contemplates with favor the construction of such a canal across the State and makes provision for and authorizes special legislation in order to facilitate such construction, and the Legislature of the State has now created a public corporation known as the "Florida Ship Canal Authority" and has granted to said corporation a franchise with full power and authority to construct said canal; and

Whereas such a canal will cut off approximately 500 miles of distance by the water route between New Orleans and the Gulf ports on the one hand and New York and Liverpool on the other, will eliminate the danger to shipping incident to passage through the Florida straits, will bring about tremendous savings by reason of the resultant reduction in time, insurance, and other transportation costs, and will constitute a valuable asset to our national defense; and

Whereas such a canal will largely solve the distribution problems of the Mississippi Valley and of the southeast section of the United States, will greatly aid the agricultural and industrial activities in said section by furnishing them perpetual and cheap transportation to the Atlantic seaboard where the best markets are located, will enhance the value of the farm lands through the producing of means for delivering their produce to market, and will offer material advantages and benefits to fully one half of the producing area of the United States; and

Whereas said ship canal, while rendering this valuable service to labor, industry, agriculture, and ocean shipping, will at the same time, and without additional cost, provide a connection between the Atlantic coastal waterway and the Gulf coastal waterway for barges and small craft plying between Boston, Mass., and Gulf of Mexico ports; and

Whereas the Corps of Engineers of the Army of the United States, pursuant to authorization of Congress, is now completing an exhaustive physical survey of various possible routes for such a canal and of the costs of the construction thereof; and

Whereas an application is now pending with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of the United States for a loan of sufficient funds with which to construct said canal, such loan to be self-liquidating in character: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Florida (the House of Representatives concurring), That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, respectfully urged to approve of said construction project as an effective measure in relieving unemployment and stimulating industry, and that he be, and he is hereby, further requested to procure the assistance and cooperation of every appropriate and available Federal agency in order that construction work upon said project may be commenced at the earliest possible date; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state be directed to furnish a certified copy of this memorial to the President of the United States, to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of the United States, and to the Associated Press.

Approved by the Governor of Florida May 27, 1933.

STATE OF FLORIDA,

Office Secretary of State, ss:

I, R. A. Gray, secretary of state of the State of Florida, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of senate committee substitute for House Concurrent Resolution No. 11, as passed by the Legislature of Florida, session 1933, and filed in this office.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State of Florida, at Tallahassee, the capital, this 30th day of May A.D. 1933.

[SEAL] R. A. GRAY,
Secretary of State.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 20 minutes.

Mr. PARKS. Mr. Speaker, on yesterday afternoon the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts asked permission to address the House for 20 minutes. Not a Democrat on this side objected, but during the afternoon the Republicans conducted a filibuster, that took more time than would have been consumed by the distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts. Therefore I feel constrained to object.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, let me ask the gentleman from Arkansas a question. I understood him to say not a Democrat objected. I remember well that the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. KENNEY] objected and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. O'BRIEN] objected. If I am wrong, I wish to be corrected.

Mr. CARPENTER of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. Speaker, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, may I say I told the gentleman from Massachusetts on yesterday that if he would postpone his request until after the consideration of the rules that I would not object and that I hoped nobody else would object. Now, we on this side were not responsible for the long time that was taken upon those rules, and, of course, neither was the gentleman from Massachusetts; and I do not want to penalize him for what somebody else did.

I may say that if this time is given I hope the House will be patient, as I know it will be when the debate starts, and we can conclude general debate on this bill today and perhaps take up something else, postponing the consideration of the bill under the 5-minute rule until tomorrow, provided the House will agree to meet at 11 o'clock. Otherwise we cannot do it. We are anxious to get rid of this bill in order that we may be nearer adjournment.

Mr. SNELL. I may say to the gentleman from Tennessee there is no disposition on this side of the aisle to delay the orderly process of the consideration of this bill.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, at this time I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, and I shall not object, I should like to have 5 minutes to address the House after the address made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM]. I wish to speak on the subject of Postal Savings, which matter is to be considered by the conferees on a pending bill.

Mr. BYRNS. I think the gentleman will have an opportunity to address the House later in the afternoon. We can sit a little longer. I am willing.

Mr. CELLER. When will the opportunity be granted, may I ask the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. BYRNS. After we conclude general debate on this bill, if the House wants to remain in session and hear the gentleman, he may then address the House.

Mr. SNELL. I hope the request of the gentleman from New York will not be tied up with the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee that when the House adjourns today it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock tomorrow?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts that he be permitted to address the House for 20 minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, the honorable Representative from the First Congressional District of my own State did an unprecedented thing in the House the day before yesterday. He attempted to influence the Committee on Rules in its action on a resolution which I had just introduced in the public interest. The resolution provided for an investigation of the relations of Norman H. Davis with international bankers, particularly J. Pierpont Morgan & Co., fiscal agents of the British Government, with international business interests, and with certain disloyal and seditious organizations. Mr. Davis is now representing the United States at Geneva, where he is publicly proclaiming the abandonment by the United States of its traditional policy in relation to its foreign affairs, and at London, where he is negotiating concerning an economic conference soon to be held which will involve not only the foreign debts of the United States but also its general international financial policy.

Defending Mr. Davis, the honorable Representative from Massachusetts stated:

Mr. Davis' honesty and integrity have never been questioned, and if questioned they could not be successfully impeached.

He also stated:

Mr. Davis' life and career are an open book.

Let me read several pages of the "open book", written by the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia and by the Supreme Court of the United States.

REVERSED IN PART

The chapter of the "open book" written by the Court of Appeals of the District of Columbia has for its title Las Ovas Co., Inc., v. Davis (35 App. 372). The chapter concludes with the following unanimous opinion, rendered June 1, 1910:

OPINION OF THE COURT

We will first consider the errors assigned by the defendants, Davis and Phillips. Their first contention is that the bill should have been dismissed because the suit was not properly authorized. This contention was urged upon the trial court. The record shows that when the resolution authorizing the bringing of the suit was passed, the president of the company and all the members of the board of directors save two—Davis being one—were present, and all save Davis had notice of the meeting. It is urged that this being a special meeting of the board, Davis should have had notice. Davis, who resided in Cuba, and who was there when this meeting was held, had, before leaving Washington, given Reid a power of attorney to vote for him at meetings of the board of directors, saying that notice of special meetings need not be sent him, as he could not come here to attend them. While a director may not legally delegate his powers, we see no reason, especially where he is without the jurisdiction, why he may not waive notice; and having waived notice, as in this case, he is estopped subsequently to alleged lack of notice.

The second ground for the dismissal of the bill is the defect of parties, the contention being that Herbert and Micou should have been joined as parties defendant. This contention is without merit. When the suit was instituted, the complainant was without knowledge that Mr. Micou had received anything more than his share of the promoters' stock, and the answer of the defendants did not disclose that he had received anything more. It is nowhere intimated in the record that Mr. Herbert knew, or had reason to know, of his partner's participation in secret profits. Herbert and Micou were not indispensable parties (Stockton v. Anderson, 40 N.J. Eq. 486, 4 Atl. 642). Except in the case of indispensable parties, the rule is well established that objection for want of parties, to be available, must be made early (Landram

v. Jordan, 25 App. D.C. 299, 300). Moreover, Micou, on the institution of this suit, had parted with his stock, and, since the decree appealed from does not charge the defendants with liability for the secret profits of Micou, they are in no way prejudiced by the failure to include him as a party.

The last ground for the dismissal of the bill is that the petitioner was not competent to maintain suit for the relief sought. The defendants base this contention upon the opinion in Old Dominion Copper Min. & Smelting Co. v. Lewisohn (210 U.S. 206, 52 L.ed. 1025; 28 Sup. Ct. Rep. 634). In that case members of a syndicate acquired properties for the purpose of conveying them, at an excessive valuation, to a corporation they were to organize. The new company, composed entirely of themselves, was formed, every incorporator having full knowledge of all the facts. Thirteen fifteenths of the stock of the company was held by the original incorporators and two fifteenths subsequently passed into the hands of innocent holders. Thereupon a bill was brought by the corporation against the estate of one of the deceased promoters, who had acted nominally as a vendor to the company of part of the property, but who was really acting for the benefit of all the proposed incorporators, to rescind the sale of that portion of the property, or to recover damages. A demurrer was interposed and sustained by the trial court. The Supreme Court sustained the decree on the ground that, the company having "assented to the transaction with the full knowledge of the facts", its action remained binding on itself after changes in its members and an increase in its capital stock, such changes and increase not affecting its identity. The court said: "The difficulty that meets the petitioner at the outset is that it has assented to the transaction with the full knowledge of the facts. If there had been innocent members at the time of the sale, the fact that there were also guilty ones would not prevent a recovery. Here thirteen fifteenths of the stock had been taken by the syndicate, the corporation was in full life, and had assented to the sale with knowledge of the facts before an outsider joined."

From our reading of the decision we think the defendants have misconceived its purport. As we read it, it is a reaffirmation of the doctrine that members of a syndicate to purchase property for a corporation to be formed by them stand in a fiduciary relation toward that corporation and that they will not be permitted to make a secret profit on the sale of such property to the corporation. Yeiser v. United States Board & Paper Co. (52 L.R.A. 724, 46 C.C.A. 567, 107 Fed. 340); Loudenslager v. Woodbury Heights Land Co. (56 N.J. Eq. 411, 41 Atl. 1115, affirming 55 N.J. Eq. 78, 35, Atl. 436); Erlander v. New Sombrero Phosphate Co. (L.R. 3 App. Cas. 1218, 6 Eng. Rul. Cas. 777). In the latter case the facts did not differ materially from the facts in the case at bar. There a syndicate entered into an agreement to sell at a profit, to a company to be organized by the sellers; but there were innocent stockholders when the company was organized, and, as the Supreme Court said in its review of the facts in its opinion in the Lewisohn case, supra, "there never was a moment when the company had assented with knowledge of the facts." So here, there never was a moment when the company, with knowledge of the facts, consented to pay $35,000 for property which it should have obtained for $20,000. The complainant was, therefore, imposed upon and defrauded, and, we think, entitled to maintain this suit.

We will here consider complainant's assignment of error relating to that part of the decree below allowing the defendant Davis to retain the 22 shares of promoters' stock now held by him. In entering upon the consideration of this question, it must be remembered that this is a proceeding in equity, and addressed to the conscience of the court. One of the last things which a court of equity should do is to reward duplicity, or make it possible for those guilty of a fraud to reap substantial benefit therefrom.

The members of this syndicate engaged therein for the purpose of acquiring and developing land in Cuba. The defendants represented, and Reid supposed, that they were acting in good faith, and advancing their pro rata share of the money necessary for the preliminary work of investigation, and later toward their pro rata share of the amount of the purchase money of the property acquired. Instead of acting in good faith, as their fiduciary relation especially demanded, they deceived and defrauded complainant by requiring it to pay $35,000 for property which had really cost but $20,000.

Instead of advancing in good faith the pro rata amounts required of them in the legitimate prosecution of the enterprise, they advanced nothing and, by the before-mentioned fraudulent methods, obtained assessable stock of the complainant. This the court had rightly ordered canceled. Can it be possible that equity demands that the promoters' stock, which these men procured under the conditions mentioned, and which is now in the possession of one of the guilty parties, and burdened with all the evidences of the fraud, should escape the condemnation of the court? As we view this record, the fraud of these parties taints the entire proceeding. There never was a moment, according to the record, when they really intended to invest a dollar in the enterprise. To be sure, they devoted some time to the project, but their good faith was at no time apparent. The theory upon which the assessable stock has been ordered to be surrendered and canceled is that it represents secret profits derived from the complainant. What does the promoters' stock now in the hands of Davis represent? It was acquired upon the theory that the members of the syndicate, having in good faith devoted their time and invested their money in inaugurating and prosecuting the enterprise, were entitled to special consideration by reason thereof. Instead of acting in good faith, the defendants practiced deceit upon the complainant, which, we think, is of such a nature and so closely related to the question now under consideration as not to justify a court of equity in distinguishing between the two kinds of stock. Of course, it was necessary for someone, if the property was to be acquired, to furnish the money. The defendants not only did not furnish any, but in addition to all the stock which they acquired there still remains in their hands over $15,000 secret profits. Can it be that such a betrayal of trust should be rewarded by recognizing the validity of the promoters' stock thus acquired? Can it be that in a court of equity such gross breach of trust as these men have been guilty of is to be rewarded to such an extent? The assessable stock which has been ordered canceled represented the fruits of a fraudulent conception, and yet, but for the fraud practiced upon the complainant, the defendants would not have received the promoters' stock. It is evident that they received that stock because it was then supposed that they were honestly acting in the interests of the complainant and assuming their share of the burdens arising. Had it been known that they were not acting in good faith and that they were not investing a dollar in the enterprise it is evident that they would have received no promoters' stock, for they had earned none. As the matter stands, therefore, the 22 shares of promoters' stock, which the decree below has awarded the defendants, represents remuneration for faithful and honest services, freed from all taint of fraud. We are unable to concur in this result. In our view this stock is entitled to no greater consideration than the assessable stock. The character of the profit realized by the defendants cannot purify its source. Their deceit should avail them nothing at the expense of the party defrauded.

The decree will therefore be reversed in party, with costs to the appellant in no. 2030, and the cause remanded with directions to enter a decree in conformity with this opinion.

The chapter of the "open book" written by the Supreme Court of the United States has for its title: Davis v. Las Ovas Co., Inc. (227 U.S. 80). The chapter concludes with the following unanimous opinion, rendered January 20, 1913:

OPINION OF THE COURT

This is a bill by the appellee to recover from appellants secret profits made by them as promoters of the Las Ovas Co. in the purchase of a part of a tract of land known as "Las Ovas" in the Republic of Cuba, and also for the cancelation of certain shares of stock issued to them as promoters.

The facts essential to judgment are not in serious dispute. They are found clearly and fully stated in the opinion by Mr. Justice Gould of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, and again in the opinion of the Court of Appeals of the District by Mr. Justice Robb.

From the facts found by both courts it appears:

(a) That the appellants and certain other persons, not parties to this suit, signed an agreement on March 19, 1904, by which they agreed to purchase for a corporation which they were to organize a specified part of a tract of land in Cuba called the "Las Ovas plantation", for the price of $34,000, to which it was later agreed to add another small parcel at an additional price of $1,000.

(b) It was further agreed that they should organize a corporation, of which they should be the incorporators, with a capital stock of $150,000, and that 40 percent of the shares should be issued to them for service as promoters and that the remaining stock should be subscribed for by them. For this subscribed stock they were to pay an amount sufficient to cover the purchase money of $35,000 and to create an expense fund of $5,000.

(c) It was agreed that the property should, when acquired, be placed in the hands of one of the group of promoters until the formation of the company, and then conveyed to it.

(d) The scheme was one originated and engineered by the appellants, who at the time of this agreement had already secretly secured an option for themselves for the purchase of this property at the price of $20,000. To conceal the true consideration from their associates they caused the property to be conveyed by the vendor to one Escalante, a stranger selected by them. The deed to Escalante recited the true consideration. Later, in pursuance of the promoters' agreement, they caused Escalante to convey to the member of the syndicate selected to hold the title until organization, reciting a consideration of $35,000.

The corporation was organized as planned. The promoters' shares were duly issued and the remaining shares taken by the promoters upon the agreed terms, its officers and directors being composed exclusively of the members of the syndicate. Thereupon the property was transferred to the company and paid for, through appellants, out of the proceeds of the subscribed stock.

The result of the transaction was that the corporation was required to pay to those who had assumed to act for and represent it a secret profit of $15,000 and also to compensate them for their services in buying the land and organizing the company by issuing to each of them $15,000 in nonassessable shares of its stock.

The decree below required the appellants to account for the profits realized by them, in part traced to certain shares in their hands, and to surrender for cancelation the shares issued to them as promoters.

It is now said that the corporation was "a mere convenient receptacle for the property, erected for the convenience of the syndicate." That the property was bought by the syndicate for their own advantage and that the corporation included only the members of the syndicate. That the stock of the company was all taken by the syndicate, who, for property which was their own, agreed to pay enough to cover the purchase price and create a small expense fund.

Upon this contention it is urged that the corporation has no right to the relief sought, as the whole transaction was a mere form adopted by the parties for their own convenience as owners of the property and owners of the corporation. It is then said: "If we admit, for the purposes of this point, that appellants did deceive some of the syndicate, what has the company to do with it?" For this they cite Old Dominion Copper Co. v. Lewisohn (210 U.S. 206), where it was held that a subordinate fraud practiced by some of the promoters of a corporation upon some of their associates was a matter wholly between them and the syndicate which gave rise to no corporate right of action in the absence of innocent incorporators or stockholders.

But that is not this case. Some of those, if not all, interested by appellants in the property and in its purchase for a proposed consideration were ignorant of the real price which they were to pay for it, and were not, therefore, in complicity with their scheme to make a secret profit. These innocent members of the syndicate became stock subscribers and directors of the company, as did appellants. The buyers and sellers were not the same. Those of the syndicate assuming to act for the corporation in acquiring the property were under obligation to disclose the truth and deal openly. In the absence of such disclosure the corporate assent was obtained on false grounds. The wrong was done when those members of the syndicate not in complicity with appellants subscribed to the stock of the company and aided their guilty associate managers in the corporate action necessary to the corporate acquisition of the property at the exaggerated price placed upon it by those who were to realize a secret profit. Thus, the original fraud practiced upon some of those associated with them in the promoters' arrangement became operative against the corporation itself. The standing of the corporation results from the fact that there were innocent and deceived members of the corporation when the property was taken over by it.

Neither is the corporate right of action defeated by the fact that the recovery will inure to the guilty as well as to the innocent, nor is the fact that all of the parties who may have shared in the secret profits are not sued fatal to the case. The corporation may well sue either one or all of those who received secret profits. There is no want of necessary parties because all are not here sued.

The distinction between a case in which all the owners of the property and all of the members of the buying corporation are the same persons, and participate in the profit realized, and the case here presented is fully recognized in Old Dominion Copper Co. v. Lewisohn, supra, as well as in Phosphate Co. v. Erlanger (5 Ch. Div. 73), and in the well-considered opinion of Judge Severens in Yeiser v. United States Paper Co. (107 Fed. Rep. 340).

There was no error in canceling the shares issued to the plaintiffs in error for promotion of the corporation. They and the other members of the syndicate received these shares upon the assumption that they had in good faith served the corporation in the procurement of the property. Obviously appellants were serving themselves to the detriment of the corporation and innocent subscribers to its stock. In such a situation the corporation may recover the shares.

The decree will be affirmed.

As may be seen from these pages of the "open book", the man whom the honorable Representative from Massachusetts would have us believe the United States is fortunate to have as its representative abroad has been denounced by two United States courts, one of them the Supreme Court of the United States, as having violated a fiduciary relationship and having taken secret profits, as having dealt in duplicity and fraud for his own benefit, as not having acted in good faith, as having been deceitful and having defrauded his business associates, as having obtained profit by fraudulent methods, as a perpetrator of gross breach of trust; in fact, as dishonest.

Upon this record and upon the record of his relations with J. Pierpont Morgan & Co. as developed by the Senate Committee on Banking, I demand that the present administration recall Norman H. Davis as the representative of the United States at Geneva and at London. [Applause.]

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I will.

Mr. FISH. Is it not a fact that Norman H. Davis was also indicted in another case in Cuba and was a fugitive from justice?

Mr. TINKHAM. I have had several statements made to me that those were the facts, but I have not ascertained the truth of these statements, so I should not make a statement to that effect.

Mr. FISH. Under what authority is Norman H. Davis acting as a roving ambassador at the present time?

Mr. TINKHAM. I know of no authority.

Mr. FISH. And under what authority of law is he being paid $17,500?

Mr. TINKHAM. I know of no authority under which he is being paid that amount.

Mr. BYRNS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. Yes.

Mr. BYRNS. Does the gentleman know that the facts stated by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISH] are true?

Mr. TINKHAM. What facts?

Mr. BYRNS. The fact that he is paid $17,500 at the present time, and I believe the gentleman has stated he does not know anything about this supposed indictment to which the gentleman from New York referred?

Mr. TINKHAM. I do not have any official information on the subject.

Mr. BYRNS. I want to submit, in justice to a man whose reputation, in my humble judgment, is above reproach, it is hardly fair for the gentleman from New York to insinuate by a question the fact that there was an indictment, when the gentleman——

Mr. FISH. Will the gentleman say——

Mr. BYRNS. Let me get through my statement.

Mr. FISH. The gentleman from Tennessee has not the floor.

Mr. BYRNS. I am speaking with the permission of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. FISH. But the gentleman does not deny he was indicted in Cuba, does he, or that he is being paid $17,500 as ambassador at large? The State Department informs me that he does receive such an amount.

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Speaker, I have not yielded to the gentleman from New York. I know nothing of an indictment. I say it is eminently unfair, by innuendo upon the floor of the House, through an inquiry with reference to an indictment when the gentleman from Massachusetts who, evidently, with his usual keenness, has endeavored to find something upon which he may base his objections to Mr. Davis, himself states that he has no knowledge of the fact.

I want to ask the gentleman this question. How many gentlemen composed this syndicate to which the gentleman has referred?

Mr. TINKHAM. I know no more about it than what appears in the cases from which I have quoted. Four are mentioned, one of whom, it appears, did not participate in the fraud.

Mr. BYRNS. I take it that the opinion of the court stated how many were prosecuted.

Mr. TINKHAM. I have read both opinions in full.

Mr. BYRNS. I take it there were a number.

Mr. TINKHAM. Four, it would appear.

Mr. BYRNS. And as I understand, the gentleman's complaint against Mr. Davis is that he participated in the formation of a syndicate which had property which they purchased for $20,000 and which was transferred to a corporation for $35,000, involving a profit of $15,000 to all the members of the syndicate, and that Mr. Davis, at the very time to which the gentleman referred in the beginning of his remarks, was absent in Cuba and was acting here through a proxy which he had undertaken to give to a member of the board.

Mr. TINKHAM. I do not understand that is the fact. The syndicate was formed in Cuba, with Mr. Davis participating.

Mr. BYRNS. I understood the gentleman to state that.

[Here the gavel fell.]

THE BANKING SITUATION

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend some remarks of my own in the RECORD in regard to the banking situation.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Speaker, no President ever dealt with a graver crisis than faces President Roosevelt today. He deserves the united support of the people in the same full measure that it would be given in war time.

There should be no play in Congress for Democratic or Republican advantage. The saving of America and her civilization is our common goal.

An erroneous conception of the meaning of cooperation should not carry us to a point where we necessarily agree fully with every administration policy. Constructive criticism helps in the right settlement of problems. The saying of "Yes, yes" to every proposal does not mean true cooperation.

I find myself sharply critical of the policy of the Treasury Department as to the opening of closed banks and the enforcement of regulations for the conduct of banks that have been opened. The Department is advocating a policy of inflation and following a policy of deflation. This results in holding by the banks of billions of assets which should be flowing into the channels of trade and credit.

Complaints have come to me that help is not extended by banks that are now open to farmers and small business men with good local collateral; that the bankers are required to demand payment of obligations of hard-pressed people at a time when it is impossible to meet them; that the great asset of personal integrity is wholly ignored in making loans; that examiners require banks to cross notes off from their assets unless the collateral back of them is listed with some stock exchange, principally the New York stock market; that bankers are instructed to refuse loans which are not certain to be paid in full at maturity; that loans will not be renewed more than once; that stocks in local industries and local assets are not considered sufficient as collateral; that notes are written for 30 days only; that when bonds held by banks go up in market value the banks do not get credit for that appreciation but are compelled to carry the bonds at a depreciated figure; that in many instances when the rural banker comes to Washington and settles a plan for reopening and returns home and appeals with success to local stockholders, depositors, and others to raise the capital agreed upon, requirements are suddenly imposed to the extent that they are impossible of execution; that communities are asked to raise amounts out of keeping with reasonable requirements and wholly beyond the financial ability of the stockholders or the community; and that instead of being helpful to rural sections the Treasury Department by its arbitrary and unreasonable rulings has porved a handicap to any recovery from the depression.

An example comes from a highly reliable source. A farmer owns a well-stocked dairy farm in a high state of cultivation and without encumbrance. The farm and stock are worth several thousand dollars. Two years ago the farmer, desiring to improve his water supply and make other improvements, borrowed $1,400 on a note signed by himself and his wife at a bank serving a farming community. Owing to the reduction in the price of milk, he had been unable to reduce the mortgage but $175. The bank holiday came on. A conservator was appointed for the bank. Now it is claimed that the bank examiner refuses to allow the conservator to list that loan as an asset, and has directed that it be taken out of the list of assets because the note has been renewed more than once.

No country bank can exist under such requirements. No community can come back under such handicaps. Many communities are being throttled financially and the good people that live in them driven to a state of desperation. They will not continue in tame submission to the dictates of misguided officials.

The ordinary run of people depend upon the local banks for business credit. The community banker knows every patron; all about his integrity and the value of his property. He knows who is worthy of credit. When these banks are hit, the welfare of millions of working people is seriously affected.

The Treasury Department is trying to force big city bank methods onto country banks. These will not work. I stated recently in the RECORD that we had no bank failure in my State during the depression; that if our Vermont banks had been left alone, they could have worked their way out of any present difficulty; and that any faithful country banker knows more about service to small communities and the maintenance of their prosperity than all the officials of the Federal Reserve System put together.

The small banks of the country, State and National, must be given a fair opportunity to operate their own affairs according to conditions in each community and yet comply with the rules of good banking. They are the strong support of the economic structure of the country. They must be kept free from the control of the bankers of our centers of population. Country banking matters cannot be adjusted through the channels of the city banks as is being attempted throughout the New England area. We have no so-called "big banker" in that section who knows the needs of rural communities or one who can therefore be safely trusted with their credit.

I am informed that the Office of the Comptroller of the Currency and the Chief Bank Examiner state that there are no standard regulations for reopening banks and no fixed standard of instructions to examiners as to how to treat loans and collateral. If that be so, and if the Treasury Department is permitting examiners from financial centers to enforce the regulations to which I refer, then the Department is directly responsible for the pinched and demoralized conditions in the small communities by reason of the failure to open the banks. If bank examiners have promulgated such regulations, they should be summarily dismissed from the service. These rules breed resentment and encourage disloyalty to our Government. Nothing but intense discouragement and a spirit of hopelessness comes to people making up the communities when burdened by such unreasonable regulations.

The handling of the situation may be a part of a campaign to force all our banks into the Federal Reserve System for further centralization of and control over the credit and resources of the Nation. This is the objective of the radio appeals of paid politicians and impractical college professors about branch banking and a unified banking system. It has been stated here that this may be the practical effect of the banking bill recently passed.

It is reported that an official of the Treasury Department has stated that two banks should be sufficient for the State of Vermont. A plan to have 2 banks serve 400 scattered communities is too absurd to even invite consideration. However, this suggested plan further indicates the ultimate objective of those who seem to be tightening a grip on the administration of the Treasury Department.

Our country bankers do not scheme to ruin men or business. They do not indulge in the practice of issuing worthless securities. They are not planning all the time how to get something for nothing. They do not organize and operate affiliates to get the benefit of control of other people's money. They do not challenge and defy the laws of the country. Why put our country banks under the control of those who are guilty of such practices?

The argument that because many small banks have failed we need a new banking system made up of large banks is not convincing. We may, with equal force, argue that we should scrap our whole industrial system because there have been many business failures.

Our Vermont banks prospered up to the time of the so-called "holiday." They have been the mainstays of our agriculture and business. They have been of great help to communities in other States. Their money has gone into almost every State west of the Mississippi River. We are proud of their contribution to the building of a great Nation. Their success proves the fallacy of the argument for their replacement.

I plead for the small community, for the country banker, for the small business man, for the small investor, for those who have struggled through the years to lay up meager savings against the days of old age, for the home and all it stands for, for a fair opportunity to work out our own problems; for individual initiative and fair competition.

Let us get back to the old ideals, to the old ways of thrift and common honesty, to faith in the institutions given us by our forbears, to the paths that led us from a few struggling communities along the Atlantic seaboard to a great Nation which became the hope of all Christendom.

The strongest contributing factor in our upbuilding has been the country bank. Let us protect this institution and the community where it exists from ruin at the hands of officials who are today imposing these destructive regulations.

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 1 minute and to extend my remarks in the RECORD with reference to the construction of a new city hall in the city of Huntington Park, under the new national construction act.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

Mr. KRAMER. Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday next, June 6, the city of Huntington Park, in my congressional district, the thirteenth, will vote on a proposed $100,000 bond issue for the construction of a new city hall. I am hopeful that it will be overwhelmingly approved. It is a most commendable and highly necessary project, not only to inure to the benefit of the people of Huntington Park for the transaction of public business in the future but will be giving many men employment. It is in line with the great public-works program of President Roosevelt. The passage of this proposed bond issue, I have no doubt, is certain and will be indicative of courage and foresight of the people of Huntington Park in rebuilding made necessary by the disaster which overtook them in March of this year.

INTERSTATE RAILROAD TRANSPORTATION

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I call up House Resolution 169.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That upon the adoption of this resolution it shall be in order to move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of S. 1580, an act to relieve the existing national emergency in relation to interstate railroad transportation, and to amend sections 5, 15a, and 19a of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, and all points of order against said bill are hereby waived. That after general debate, which shall be confined to the bill and continue not to exceed 3 hours, to be equally divided and controlled by the chairman and ranking minority member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, the bill shall be read for amendment under the 5-minute rule. It shall be in order to consider without the intervention of any point of order the substitute committee amendment recommended by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce now in the bill, and such substitute for the purpose of amendment shall be considered under the 5-minute rule as an original bill. At the conclusion of such consideration the Committee shall rise and report the bill to the House with such amendments as may have been adopted, and any Member may demand a separate vote in the House on any of the amendments adopted in the Committee of the Whole to the bill or committee substitute. The previous question shall be considered as ordered on the bill and amendments thereto to final passage without intervening motion except one motion to recommit.

Mr. POU. I should like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he wants time on that side?

Mr. RANSLEY. I will say that it is an open rule, and there is no disposition to oppose it on this side.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I will consume just enough time to say that this rule provides for the consideration of the so-called "Railroad Act" an act to relieve the existing national emergency in relation to interstate railroad transportation. It is an open rule, except where it has provided against the intervention of points of order. It provides for 3 hours' general debate, after which the bill is to be read under the 5-minute rule, and of course is subject to amendment.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. I will.

Mr. SNELL. We appreciate the fact that this is an important piece of legislation, and when you bring in a rule for the consideration of important legislation under the general rules of the House there will be no desire on this side of the House in any way to interfere with the reasonable and regular procedure of the House. We are for the rule.

Mr. POU. Inasmuch as the Committee on Rules in this particular instance succeeded in bringing in a rule which is satisfactory to both sides of the House, I see no need of consuming further time.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Yes.

Mr. KVALE. I should like to ask the Chairman of the Rules Committee, whom we all love, if the committee will not abandon the practice of bringing in rules that call for the waiving of all points of order?

Mr. POU. I wish we could proceed under the general rules of the House and do business that way. I have an idea I would like to see that put in force, but as a practical proposition I am afraid it is impossible.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. I will.

Mr. BANKHEAD. It has been suggested by the Chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee that it is not the real desire of the committee to read the bill under the 5-minute rule this afternoon, and it has been suggested, if agreeable, to extend the general debate beyond the 3 hours.

Mr. SNELL. I did not quite understand the gentleman's statement.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The gentleman from Texas, Chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, made a suggestion to the majority leader in my hearing that it was not the expectation of the committee to read the bill under the 5-minute rule this afternoon. In view of that fact we might have more than 3 hours' general debate today.

Mr. SNELL. If that is the desire of the majority, there will be no objection on this side.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest this: That we have general debate until the House adjourns today, if requests are made for that much time. The reason for it is that the full report on the bill would have been here this morning if there had not been objection yesterday. It cannot be here until tomorrow, and I think it is only fair to have the report before us when we read the bill.

Mr. POU. That can be arranged after the adoption of the rule. I move the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that debate be confined to the bill, to be equally divided between and controlled by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PARKER] and myself, and that general debate shall close at adjournment of the House today.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (S. 1580) to relieve the existing national emergency in relation to interstate railroad transportation, and to amend sections 5, 15a, and 19a of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill S. 1580, with Mr. HILL of Alabama in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 30 minutes. This bill is divided into two parts. Title I of the bill has to do with one thing, and title II of the bill has to do with two other matters of very great importance. Title II of the bill has been under consideration by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House for several years. During the last session of Congress the committee reported the so-called "repeal of recapture", or 15a of the Transportation Act of 1920. It also reported a bill to bring the acquisition of railroads by the device of the holding company under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Those two bills, which I shall discuss more in detail, compose title II of this bill. Title I of the bill is a new venture in railroad legislation. In order that the Committee may understand one of the main reasons, at least, for the committee reporting title I of the bill, I refer, gentlemen, to page 7 of the hearings and the third recommendation of the President of the United States in his message to Congress on May 4, as to what he should like to see done in the field of railway regulation.

That paragraph of the President's message reads as follows:

> As a temporary emergency measure I suggest the creation of a Federal Coordinator of Transportation who, working with groups of railroads, will be able to encourage, promote, or require action on the part of carriers in order to avoid duplication of service, prevent waste, and encourage financial reorganization. Such a coordinator should also in carrying out this policy render useful services in maintaining railroad employment at a fair wage.

The committee, taking this suggestion, has worked and brought forth title I of this bill. It might also be said that after rather lengthy conferences between the Secretary of Commerce, representatives of labor organizations, representatives of the railroads and the shippers, a committee was suggested, and a committee of six met and made the first draft of title I. That committee consisted of the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of Commerce, Senator Dill, Commissioner Eastman, Dr. Splawn, and myself. We brought out the bill that was introduced originally. The same bill was introduced in the Senate and in the House. The Senate completed its labors and reported a bill first, and as some of us were not very keen to go up against some of the provisions that we knew were going to be presented and probably adopted, we waited the action of the Senate.

Before we completed our consideration of title I in executive session, we had conferences, or some of us did, with Senator DILL and the representatives of the railway labor organizations, and I had many conferences with the representatives of the railroads, railway employees, and the shippers. So it might be said that the amendments with reference to labor—and that has been one of the things that have given a great many on the committee and off the committee concern—adopted by the Senate, called the labor provisions of the bill, have been in the main accepted by the House committee, with possibly one exception. The exception, as I understand it, was acceptable to the representatives of labor. It was to make it definite that the 43 percent of railroad employees in the country who are not members of the standard organizations would not be put out and denied representation in conferences with the coordinator. So, as far as the labor provisions were concerned, I think I might say that both in the House bill and the Senate bill, as reported, they are acceptable to the representatives of organized labor.

Mr. STUBBS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. STUBBS. To ask a question in regard to the personnel of railroad labor and their reduction. Is it expected to keep up the present number of employees?

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, the bill provides that no action of the coordinator shall result in the reduction of the number of railroad employees as of May 1933.

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. DUNN. In other words, the American Federation of Labor and the railroad brotherhoods put their stamp of approval on this bill?

Mr. RAYBURN. The American Federation of Labor has nothing to do with it. I did not confer with them. I conferred with the representatives of the standard organizations.

Mr. DUNN. And they put their stamp of approval on this bill?

Mr. RAYBURN. They did not object to it.

Mr. DUNN. Is the railroad brotherhood in favor of this House bill?

Mr. RAYBURN. I understand so.

Mr. THURSTON. If this bill is enacted into law, will it result in lower freight rates?

Mr. RAYBURN. As the bill was originally drawn, I thought that some economies might be brought about that might respond in reduction of rates. As the bill now stands, to be frank with the gentleman, I very seriously doubt if there is anything in the bill as such that will force a reduction in the freight rates.

Mr. THURSTON. Will there be any movement to reduce the capital structure of the railroads?

Mr. RAYBURN. That is the hope, and if I may, I will proceed to rates and capital structure of railroads in a few minutes.

As to the capital structure of the railroads, I do not think there is any question in the world but that along with all individuals and all other industry there must be reorganizations of railroads, that their capital structures must be scaled down, and that the American people, in the economic condition in which we find ourselves at this time, are unable to meet the charges on transportation that would be necessary to pay a reasonable return on the capital structures of the railroads as they are now set up.

Now, as to rates, I will say we are hoping in this bill to do something that may allow some readjustment of rates. Frankly, I am not an expert on rates, but I know that when the commodities that move in transportation are as cheap as they are today, they cannot move and pay as large a proportion of the cost in transportation as they have to pay now.

I am of the opinion that the railroads of the country would make more money if substantial decreases in both passenger and freight rates were brought about. [Applause.] I may say that the whole question is being reviewed by the Interstate Commerce Commission at this time, but when their decision will be made I do not know. I am hoping they will find it in the public interest and lawful to make material reductions in both passenger and freight rates.

I am also of the opinion, after studying this question more or less for several years, that the railroads have not done all they could to meet their competition. I asked Judge Thom, who at that time was the representative of the railway executives, and I asked Judge Heiserman, who was attorney for the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., last spring, if they knew of anybody in the entire world who exercised less judgment than railroads when they started out to compete with each other, and they both answered that they did not. They have sat down rather grimly and have allowed the bus and truck to take their business away from them, and they have not done all that they could to meet that competition, and to stay in the transportation field.

Freight rates are exactly like tariff rates. There is a level at which you can place tariff rates at which they will produce the maximum amount of revenue that flows into the Treasury. If you put them higher than that, none comes in, because the commerce does not move under them. The same is true with railroad rates. There is a level at which you can place railroad rates that is fair, that is just, and that is reasonable, and under which freight and commerce will go on through the country, and at which they will produce the maximum amount of revenue.

With reference to this bill and title I, I first wish to refer to a statement of Dr. Splawn at pages 13 to 29 of hearings on H.R. 5500, by your committee. He has been making an investigation for our committee, out of which grew the holding-company part of this bill, and who has worked with us on section 15a, and who has developed the ownership of every railroad in the United States, its mileage, its officers, its directors, its 30 largest stockholders, and has given us a picture of the whole railroad ownership throughout the land. That investigation was also made under the chairmanship of Mr. PARKER of New York.

In the last session of Congress Dr. Splawn made an investigation of the holding companies in the pipe-line field, covering gas, gasoline, and oil. With the exception of the Insull set-up, which will take a few more months to complete, he is finishing a complete picture of the power companies, their ownership, their controls, their interrelations among themselves and with other business institutions. He is developing the relations of the holding companies to the operating companies in the telephone and telegraph field, apparently one of the most fruitful fields in which the holding company, unregulated, has operated.

At this time I want to pay tribute to the patriotism, to the sanity, to the industry and the great ability of Dr. Splawn, because, in my opinion, he is one of the most valuable men that has ever been connected with the Government, and I trust he is marked for a higher place in the Government.

Mr. ARNOLD. Will the gentleman tell us what hearings he is referring to?

Mr. RAYBURN. I am referring to the hearings held on H.R. 5500.

Now, I wish to state what Commissioner Eastman thinks will be accomplished under this bill. He thinks the following may be accomplished, or at least he thought before it was amended, that that might be accomplished.

The purposes of the bill, as he interprets them, are these: To do away with existing wastes and duplication of services; wastes which exist at large railroad centers and which could be eliminated by the use of joint terminals, both passenger and freight; unnecessary passenger and freight service, which could be eliminated by pooling arrangements; unduly circuitous routes; extravagance in solicitation of traffic; waste in equipment-repairing expense, such as could be avoided by joint use of certain shops and the abandonment of others; waste in passenger ticket offices, such as could be avoided by combined ticket offices; unnecessary allowances to large shippers in certain services; unduly low charges for warehouses and like accessorial services; waste in use of equipment, such as might be avoided by pooling arrangements, change in car rentals, and other means of reducing empty return movement of cars; wasteful practices in the purchase of equipment, rails, ties, materials, and supplies, including not only purchasing methods but also standardization of specifications; reduction of unprofitable operations and provisions for better service by substitution of motor vehicles for steam service and their use as accessorial service, and so forth.

These are some of the things it is hoped to be accomplished under the appointment of the coordinator.

Now, under the coordinator provision of the bill the President can appoint anyone whom he pleases coordinator by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, or he can appoint a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission as coordinator and relieve him of his duties as Commissioner while he is acting as coordinator.

The bill provides that this legislation is emergency legislation and shall have effect for but 1 year unless by proclamation it is extended for another year by the President of the United States. So, in no instance, can this emergency legislation last more than 24 months.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question about the powers of the coordinator?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. All I have before me is Senate bill 1580, but, as I read that, the coordinator will not be called upon to or exercise any power except in the event that carriers in the group through their committees cannot agree, and refer the matter to him. In other words, as I read the Senate bill, the railway companies who make up these regional committees can exercise all the powers of this bill with reference to abandoning trackage, terminals, and everything else without the intervention of the coordinator, except in case they cannot agree, and must call on him to act.

Mr. RAYBURN. These things cannot be done without the consent of the coordinator where they violate existing law. The coordinator cannot do these things unless they are initiated by the carriers; further than that, the Interstate Commerce Commission at the present time has control over the matters you mention.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. The bill reads in the disjunctive:

> No railroads now existing shall be eliminated except with the consent of the participating lines or upon order of the coordinator.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes. The committee struck out that first provision there as being a thing that the Interstate Commerce Commission and the proposed coordinator do not believe to be workable. The coordinator acts through suggestion to these groups. He makes suggestions as to what he thinks will improve the service, what will do away with waste, what will make for better service, what will be less extravagant, and then he puts it up to the carriers through the regional committee and sees if he cannot get them to make a voluntary agreement. Otherwise, he is allowed to put it into effect himself.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. This shows the disadvantage of debating a bill without having it before the House.

Mr. RAYBURN. I may say to the gentleman that neither I nor the committee are responsible for the fact the printed bill is not before the House.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I think section 4 of the Senate bill makes it very clear that the railroads have absolute and complete control of all the powers of this bill up to the point where they fail to agree.

Mr. RAYBURN. Not at all.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. Up to the point where they have to call in the coordinator.

Mr. RAYBURN. May I call the attention of the gentleman to section 6 of the bill?

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. If I understood the gentleman correctly, he stated that but for an amendment he was hopeful there might be a reduction in freight rates under the bill. May I ask the gentleman what amendment he has in mind that will be likely to prevent that?

Mr. RAYBURN. I have amendments in mind that prevent the coordinator from making certain savings.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I am just wondering if the gentleman would inform the House what those amendments are.

Mr. ARENS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. ARENS. If the railroads were compelled to pay this man $1,500 for the loss of value of his house because the shops were moved, would they not come back to the Government and ask reimbursement?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; they would not come back to the Government, because there is no guaranty of anything like that; but as the representative of the shippers said, they might take it out of the hides of the shippers.

Mr. ARENS. They might increase the rates?

Mr. RAYBURN. Possibly.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. KOPPLEMANN. Can the gentleman give us a few words with reference to the relationship between the coordinator and the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. RAYBURN. The coordinator will work with the Commission. He has no connection with the Commission, however, unless he is designated from the Commission. Of course, he would use all of the data and information that has been accumulated by the Commission all of these years, but there is no connection between the coordinator and the Interstate Commerce Commission. He acts independently. His decisions are appealable to the Interstate Commerce Commission. If any interested party is dissatisfied with a decision or an order of the coordinator, he may appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission, and the Interstate Commerce Commission after hearing the camplaint may entertain an appeal or not, or may have a hearing and a determination or not.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. I have the highest regard for the gentleman's opinion and I should like to ask him if in his judgment the provision which would prevent the further reduction of employees will be calculated to prevent the reduction of freight rates?

Mr. RAYBURN. If business conditions stay like they are now, that will be the tendency; but it is the hope of everybody, it is the belief of the employees, it is the hope of the Interstate Commerce Commission and of many of us on the committee, that business within the next few months is going to pick up materially, in all probability 20 or 25 percent. In this way, there will not be any necessity for reducing the number of employees on the railroads, but there will be necessity for a considerable increase.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. What will be the hope of those employees who have been laid off returning to their former positions or being reemployed?

Mr. RAYBURN. I think that is done by seniority and they are placed on the board according to seniority and called back in that way. Perhaps there is someone else here who knows more about that phase of it than I do.

Mr. MEAD. If the gentleman will yield right there, I think this is so. The bill safeguards the employees on the rolls as of May 1933, but it in no wise protects the 700,000 employees who are temporarily laid off, and it will permit such economies as will result from increased business to flow to the railroads without taking on the men whom the gentleman has in mind, and they are probably permanently out of work.

Mr. RAYBURN. And I may say this, too: Under the provisions of this bill, when a vacancy occurs by reason of death, resignation, or discharge for cause, the railroads are not forced to fill that place. Now, what they do is this: They do fill the place, but they promote from the junior to the higher grade, or whatever grade it may be, and when they get to the bottom they leave off one man, if his services are not necessary, and the estimate of the saving in this respect is that it will amount to from 5 to 6 percent of the men each year, and there are in the neighborhood of 1,000,000 men working for the railroads. So 5 or 6 percent of the men working for the railroads would be 50,000 or 60,000 a year, and therefore, if the man whose place is not filled was receiving only $1,600 a year and if 50,000 employees were to be discharged or their places left vacant for the reasons I have stated, this would effect a saving of $80,000,000.

Mr. COX. Do I understand it to be the meaning of what the gentleman has said that operating costs would not increase correspondingly with the increase of business, and that the increase of business, of course, which we expect and must have, would operate to reduce transportation costs?

Mr. RAYBURN. That is our hope.

Now, if there are no further questions on title I of this bill, I should like to pass to something that I know a great deal more about and am somewhat more interested in.

Mr. BLANCHARD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. BLANCHARD. The gentleman referred to the reduction in employees by resignation, death, or normal retirements. Is there not a limitation of 5 percent placed in the bill?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; and that is how I arrived at my estimate of 50,000 men.

Mr. DUNN. Does the gentleman mean that 50,000 employees would be dismissed?

Mr. RAYBURN. No; but it is possible under the operations of this bill at the end of the year for 50,000 employees to be eliminated in the ways I have suggested; but the bill specifically provides that nobody working for the railroads shall be laid off by any act of the coordinator.

Mr. MEAD. If the gentleman will be kind enough to inform the Committee, I am sure they would like to know whether the House bill contains all the so-called "labor amendments" adopted by the Senate.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; it does; but after a conference the other day, an amendment to 7 (a), I think, was agreed to by all concerned.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 additional minutes.

Section 7 (a) in the Senate bill, as it was interpreted, simply provided for representation for the employees who were members of the organizations that made the contracts at Chicago in February 1932. It is estimated that 57 percent of the railway employees belong to the standard organizations. There are 43 percent, more or less, who do not belong to the standard organizations. They belong to company unions and other unions, or what not. So we provided an amendment in the House bill that other organizations should have representation, provided it was such an organization as was eligible to come in under the Railway Labor Act of 1923.

Mr. MEAD. Following that up, Senator DILL, or one of the other Senators who is a member of the committee in charge of the bill in the Senate, left the impression in the Senate that the administration—and I presume by that he means the President—favors the so-called "labor amendments." Is that the gentleman's information?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. WITHROW. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. WITHROW. It is not the gentleman's desire to leave the impression with the Committee——

Mr. RAYBURN. It is not my desire to leave any impression except the correct one, I will tell the gentleman that.

Mr. WITHROW. Just a moment. That 43 percent of the employees working on the railroads belong to the independent organizations?

Mr. RAYBURN. That is the best information I have.

Mr. WITHROW. The gentleman does not wish to leave that impression?

Mr. RAYBURN. That is exactly the impression I intended to leave, because that is what has been told me by people who are supposed to know. Of course, I said "more or less", because I am depending on information that was given to me that in the neighborhood of 43 percent of the employees belong to such organizations.

Mr. WITHROW. But the gentleman does not mean to say they belong to the independent organizations, does he?

Mr. RAYBURN. What is the gentleman talking about when he speaks of "independent organizations"?

Mr. WITHROW. I mean the independent organizations outside of the standard railroad organizations, which comprise 57 percent.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is exactly what my impression is.

Mr. WITHROW. Well, they do not.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio, who is well informed on such questions.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I think I can explain this to the House. It was testified before our committee during the hearings that 43 percent of the railroad employees were not affiliated with the 16 standard railroad brotherhood organizations that comprise 57 percent of the employees, but the fact was not brought out that the remaining 43 percent belong to some other organizations.

Mr. WITHROW. Yes; that is it.

Mr. RAYBURN. What I intended to say was they were outside of the standard organizations. Now, so far as I am concerned, I am through with title I, unless someone wishes to ask further questions.

Mr. GRISWOLD. I should like to ask the gentleman a question. I did not hear the first part of the gentleman's statement regarding the payment of losses in the event of the removal of terminals. When is the effective date that pertains to that?

Mr. RAYBURN. On the enactment of the act.

Mr. GRISWOLD. There is no date fixed in the act?

Mr. RAYBURN. In other words, the act is in effect when the coordinator is appointed?

Mr. GRISWOLD. I want to call attention to the fact that during the last year several hundred terminals have been abolished.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. The gentleman said that the basic employment figures would be as of May. Would not it be better if an average was taken between May, when it will be at a low ebb, and the time when it will be at the highest?

Mr. RAYBURN. That would have been agreeable to me; but, as I understand, it was not agreeable to gentlemen interested in labor. They seem to want to take May of this year, and so that was agreed upon.

Now, passing to title II. In the Transportation Act of 1920 a section grants the right of permissive consolidation. The act provided that if two or more railroads wanted to bring their property together in a consolidation or merger or lease or otherwise, that they should file a petition to the Interstate Commerce Commission and receive the approval of the Commission before they made a consolidation, and after meeting requirements laid down in the statute they might consolidate on the approval of the Commission.

The President said in his message:

> Railway holding companies should be placed definitely under the regulation and control of the Interstate Commerce Commission in like manner as the railways themselves.

It also provided that the Interstate Commerce Commission should bring forth a plan for the consolidation of railroads. They turned this job over to Prof. William Z. Ripley, of Harvard, a great transportation expert, a thorough scholar, and an able and highly patriotic citizen.

He brought forth a tentative plan several years ago for the consolidation of the railroads of the United States into 19 or 20 systems. With slight modifications the Commission adopted his as their tentative plan. After a lapse of several years the Commission put out a final plan. The roads have not used that consolidation plan greatly—they seem to be unable to get together themselves in order to file an application to the Interstate Commerce Commission because they cannot agree as to mileage, they cannot agree as to costs, and so forth.

But in the meantime some of the railroads of the country, desiring to consolidate or bring together their properties, did bring together properties that they had reason to believe the Interstate Commerce Commission would not approve of, and in some instances properties were brought together after the Commission had denied the right to unify.

I might be specific. The process of pyramiding may be illustrated by the stock of the Chesapeake & Ohio Railroad. A majority of the stock of that railroad was held on April 30, 1930, by the Chesapeake Corporation, and constituted the great bulk of that holding company's assets. Against these assets it had issued $46,748,000 of its own bonds and stock carried as a liability of $74,242,042. A majority of the stock of the Chesapeake Corporation was owned by the Alleghany Corporation, which in turn issued bonds, preferred stock largely without voting power, and common stock. A large block of Alleghany common was owned by the General Securities Corporation and a large block of the stock of that holding company by the Vaness Co.

The purchases of the Alleghany Corporation were largely made near the top of the market at high prices. House Report No. 2789 shows, for example, that it paid $159.87 per share for Pere Marquette stock, $60 for Erie common, $130.21 for Nickel Plate common, $80.87 for Missouri Pacific common, $136.05 for Missouri Pacific preferred, and $95.19 for Kansas City Southern common. In contrast with these prices the Chesapeake & Ohio has recently purchased 46,200 shares of Pere Marquette stock from the Alleghany Corporation at $11 per share, as contrasted with the $159.87 paid, and has been given a 4-year option to purchase 215,000 shares of Erie common at $13.25 per share, as contrasted with the $60 paid.

The Van Sweringens went across the Mississippi River and bought up 51 percent of the stock of the Missouri Pacific, one of the great railroad systems of the country. They paid a high price for the securities. That railroad has taken advantage of the amendment to the Bankruptcy Act of March 3, and now is in process of reorganization.

The common stock of that railroad now is selling on the exchange for as little as $3.50 per share. We believed that after Congress granted the railroads the valuable privilege of being allowed to consolidate their properties where they wanted to, even in violation of antitrust laws, with the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission, they should not, either in spirit or by letter, disobey the law. But they have done it and have gotten themselves into a great deal of trouble. I might say to the gentlemen from New England that with the aid of the holding company known as "Penroad Corporation", not owned by the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., but officered and controlled by the men who run the Pennsylvania Railroad Co., they have gone into New England and bought up 23 percent or more of the stock of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, and have also obtained large holdings in the Boston & Maine. The Pennsylvania Railroad Co., I might say, is not vitally interested in concentrating movement of traffic to any port in New England, but rather is interested in the port of New York and in the port of Philadelphia. New England is fast becoming, I think, the back yard so far as transportation is concerned that really belongs to it.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. The gentleman does not think that if the 4- or 5-way consolidation plan goes through, the New England lines should not be included in the consolidation of trunk-line territory, does he?

Mr. RAYBURN. I am not discussing that. I should dislike very much to see it done. I think New England ought to have a railroad system of its own, but you have not got it now through this control of the Penroad. In future we want to prevent those things, and we say in this bill that hereafter no railroad properties shall be brought together through the device of a holding company without first applying to and receiving the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. GOSS. Is there anything in the bill, or in any other bill, that would require the divesting of the Penroad or the so-called "Pennsylvania", down to a smaller amount of stock?

Mr. RAYBURN. I was in favor of the bill's containing a provision providing for the unscrambling of corporate affiliations in cases where not approved by the Commission, but my judgment in the matter did not predominate, and the provision which I believe the gentleman may be thinking of, the new paragraph (11) of section 5, begins from now and is not retroactive. It relates only to stock holdings, tested according to its future effect, though for this purpose it is immaterial when the holdings were acquired. It should be noted that by the terms of section 204 of the bill the existing provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act and other laws are preserved, so far as necessary, to apply with full force to acquisitions of control which have heretofore taken place. This section does not, of course, limit or affect the operation of the new paragraph (11) of section 5 here proposed. I should like very much to have given the Interstate Commerce Commission the authority, and I think Congress has the power to give it the authority, to unscramble some of these things that have been done.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman offer such an amendment?

Mr. RAYBURN. But my judgment in that did not prevail. We had some lawyers in the committee and out of the committee who did not believe Congress had the power to do it and others who doubted the wisdom of the policy.

There is a real necessity for these amendments to section 5 of the Interstate Commerce Act.

In its annual report for 1929 the Interstate Commerce Commission expressed the belief that through the activities of holding companies—

> The subjection of the unification of carriers by railroad to the orderly processes of a carefully planned scheme of public regulation, which section 5 was designed to accomplish, is very likely to be partially or even wholly defeated, subject to the possibility that the Clayton Antitrust Act may in some measure, after protracted litigation, enable control over the situation to be maintained.

The House of Representatives passed Resolution 114, Seventy-first Congress, second session, under which the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce conducted a thorough and comprehensive investigation. The results of that investigation were published as House Report No. 2789, Seventy-first Congress, third session. Incorporated in this report at page LXXXV were the recommendations of special counsel to the effect that section 5 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, be amended so as to bring within the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, for approval or disapproval, any acquisition of the control of a railroad which would result in bringing that railroad into affiliation with, in control of, or under the management of another railroad, whether the acquisition be by holding company or otherwise, and that when a holding company is thus permitted to control a carrier by railroad, directly or indirectly, through ownership of stock, thereafter the accounts and capitalization of that holding company shall be subject to regulation by the commission.

The Interstate Commerce Commission in its annual report for 1931, at page 21 and at pages 84 to 86, made recommendations in harmony with this recommendation of the special counsel to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. These recommendations were based upon the facts disclosed by the investigation conducted under House Resolution 114 and published in House Report No. 2789, Seventy-first Congress, third session. All the pertinent facts are contained in that report.

In line with these recommendations and to remedy the defects in existing law disclosed by the facts contained in House Report No. 2789, H.R. 9059 was drafted. The chairman of the legislative committee of the Interstate Commerce Commission testified in the hearings on H.R. 9059 (p. 238) that the bill had been submitted to the entire Commission and considered in conference, together with a statement which the chairman of the legislative committee of the Commission had made before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce (pp. 47 to 83, hearings, H.R. 9059), and the Commission unanimously approved H.R. 9059.

The investigation under House Resolution 114 (H.Rept. No. 2789, 71st Cong., 3d sess.) disclosed that an important weakness of section 5, as it now stands, is that it places no control upon the activities of so-called "holding companies" in effecting unification of railway properties into systems. H.R. 9059 formed the basis for sections 1 to 4 of the present bill. In the hearings on that bill special counsel for the committee and the chairman of the legislative committee of the Interstate Commerce Commission illustrated this weakness of section 5. (Examples taken from H.Rept. No. 2789.) Striking illustrations are recorded on pages 21 to 26 and 48 to 50 of the record of hearings on H.R. 9059. The investigation into the holding companies conducted by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce disclosed that acquisitions which had been disapproved after formal hearings by the Interstate Commerce Commission had afterward been accomplished through the use of holding companies. It further revealed that systems which had been approved by the Commission as in the public interest, and which in harmony with the Commission's completed plan would be independent of one another, had been brought under the control of a single holding company. This investigation made clear that the independence one of another of the railroad systems resulting from the congressional plan included in section 5 of the act to regulate commerce was in some instances being destroyed and in others seriously threatened. (H.Rept. No. 2789, 71st Cong., 3d sess., pp. 714ff and 878ff.)

Apart from section 5 of the Interstate Commerce Act, the Commission has certain jurisdiction under the Clayton Act over acquisitions of control, direct or indirect, of one railroad by another, or acquisitions of common control of two or more railroads, where it can be established that the effect of such acquisitions may be to substantially lessen competition between the corporations involved, or to restrain the commerce in which they are engaged, or to tend to create a monopoly of any line of commerce. But the enforcement of the Commission's authority to break up such combinations after they have been put together is hedged about by many difficulties, and probably no such authority exists under the Clayton Act in the case of certain of the unifications which have been accomplished through the use of holding companies and which are described in House Report No. 2789.

Whether or not all or any of these unifications are consistent with the public interest does not have to be determined in order to reveal the necessity of further legislation. The important point is that unifications and groupings of railroads have been accomplished entirely without supervision by the Commission and without any opportunity to consider the question of public interest. Under section 5 of the act to regulate commerce it was the purpose of Congress to place the unification of the railway properties of the United States entirely within the control of the Commission. The investigation conducted by the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, under House Resolution 114, reveals that wide opportunities exist for accomplishing such unifications without any such control and in complete defeat of the intent of the Congress. Moreover, these opportunities to circumvent the will of Congress, as expressed in section 5, exist irrespective of what the public interest may be. It is to correct this condition, and to prevent through the use of holding companies and other devices the defeat of the congressional will, that this bill has been drawn.

This bill specifically treats a holding company which has been authorized to acquire a railroad as though it were a common carrier in that, first, it must obtain approval of the Commission to acquire control of two or more railroads; second, after obtaining such approval it must then, like the railroads, be subject to paragraphs (1) to (10), inclusive, of section 20 of the act (relating to reports, accounts, and so forth, of carriers), and to paragraphs (2) to (11), inclusive, of section 20a (relating to issues of securities and assumption of liabilities of carriers).

Another part of title II deals with 15a of the Transportation Act of 1920, and in that connection I might quote a little history. The Government took over the railroads during the war. The Transportation Act of 1920 returned the railroads to their owners. The House passed a bill and the Senate passed a bill. We went into conference, and the Conference Committee agreed to the Transportation Act of 1920. The House passed a rule of rate making, which I think is fair. The Senate passed a rule of rate making that was fairly reasonable. The President said in his message:

> First, I recommend the repeal of the recapture provisions of the Interstate Commerce Commission Act. The Commission has pointed out that existing provisions are unworkable and impracticable.

In the committee of conference they wrote 15a, containing the rule of rate making and providing for the recapture of excess earnings. The Interstate Commerce Commission in three of its reports has recommended the repeal of the recapture of 15a ab initio, or from the beginning, wiping the whole thing off the books. The Interstate Commerce Commission has contended since the passage of 15a that it tried to enforce a rule of rate making which was impossible of administration. There are many factors besides value that should be considered in making a rate. It was thought that if you fixed a rate at which the average railroad would make 6 percent it would be a fair return, but what was provided was a reasonable return, because otherwise some well-circumstanced roads would make an unreasonable return. So it was provided that if a railroad under that rate made more than 6 percent the Government would recapture half of the excess above 6 percent and put it into a fund in the Treasury to the credit of the Interstate Commerce Commission to be loaned to weak railroads.

It developed that the railroads said, "We do not owe this money; the Interstate Commerce Commission has not fixed a value; we have not agreed to the value the Interstate Commerce Commission has fixed." In the O'Fallon case, the railroad carried the matter to the Supreme Court of the United States, and the Supreme Court of the United States said that the Interstate Commerce Commission's method of valuation was not fair to the railroads. The Interstate Commerce Commission said that valuation should be based upon prudent investment, and the Supreme Court said that prudent investment should be one of the controlling factors, but that reproduction costs had not been considered to as full a degree in the valuation of the railroad as they should have been under the clause that provides that property may not be taken for public use without just compensation.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. What is the total amount that has been paid in?

Mr. RAYBURN. May I just proceed, and I will try to cover this entire question.

There has been no arrival at the amount nor any agreement as to the amount that the railroads owe. The Interstate Commerce Commission, under its valuation—under the law they have been trying to get Congress to repeal for about 4 years—claims it is in the neighborhood of $361,000,000. The amount captured is in the neighborhood of $10,000,000. That is all that has ever been captured.

I might say that about $4,000,000 of that amount was paid in by the little, weak fellows who did not feel they could fight the United States Government, and they paid it in, and they are in desperation now for need of that money. The gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. KERR] has been very much interested in this matter. There was one little railroad in North Carolina that was owned by a town down there. It was a revenue producer for the town, and they made some money and paid to the Government. The Government has held it ever since.

Furthermore, let me say that not a dollar of that $10,000,000 has ever been loaned to a weak railroad, for the simple reason that the Interstate Commerce Commission fixed rules and regulations, and set 6 percent as the rate of interest, and any railroad, short or long, poor or fat, that could borrow money under the regulations which the Interstate Commerce Commission set could go out in the open market and borrow money for less than 6 percent.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Is it not also true that the greater part of this $10,000,000 was paid under protest?

Mr. RAYBURN. Practically every dollar of it was paid under protest. The Interstate Commerce Commission says if they are going to enforce this thing, this rule of rate making that they do not think is fair, if they are to enforce this recapture provision which they do not think should be enforced, they will have to go into court over nearly every dollar of it, and that only after long, tedious, expensive lawsuits which will cost the Government of the United States millions of dollars, can they bring this thing to an adjustment.

They do not know, then, whether or not the courts, as in the O'Fallon case, will say their valuation is wrong and that the railroad which they then claimed owed $10,000,000 does not owe the Government of the United States anything. More than that, the best thinkers on transportation—and I do not mean those who own railroads or who are financially interested in them—believe that at this time it is impracticable to collect one dollar of the $361,000,000; and that this cloud hanging over the railroads of the country is helping to destroy their credit, and that this threat of unrecoverable money should be lifted from the railroads.

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. KVALE. When the committee decided it was advisable to repeal the recapture clause, did it then consider the advisability of reducing the guaranty of 5¾ percent?

Mr. RAYBURN. We repeal the whole rule of rate making, and write a new rule of rate making, not based upon value.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. The fact remains that Congress passed a law in 1920 providing for recapture.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Thirteen years have passed. Who is responsible for not taking this matter to the courts and keeping it there until a decision was finally rendered as to whether or not the railroads should pay the money or whether the Government was entitled to it?

Mr. RAYBURN. The Commission has not carried those cases through the courts. It has taken these years to try to arrive at the valuations required.

I may say to the gentleman that my idea on it has not changed since 1920. I always thought it was an unreasonable and unworkable rule of rate making, and that if a reasonable rate is set, every man who devoted his property to the service of the transportation ought to have what it paid, and that the recapture end of it was a fantastic thing that I never did sanction.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Be that true, nevertheless it seems to me that the Government official, regardless of his opinion, should carry out that act until the Congress had finally repealed it.

Mr. RAYBURN. I may say this, in defense of the Interstate Commerce Commission, that the valuation of the railroads has not yet been completed; and that is one reason why they have been unable to proceed with prosecuting these things to final judgment, because they did not know exactly what the valuation of the railroads was. They have tentative valuations. They have guesses; very good guesses; but the recapture finding is also tentative and indefinite, in a way.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. But the failure to complete the valuation was due to the Congress' not setting a date when it should be completed, instead of giving them millions of dollars to carry on and keep people in jobs year after year.

Mr. RAYBURN. On the contrary, it was due to the time-consuming, impractical task assigned to the Commission by the Congress. Another thing we do in that is to relieve the Interstate Commerce Commission of the burden of bringing valuations down to date with the particularity now prescribed.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. COX. In what way is this provision related to other provisions of the act, and how is it necessary in the perfection of what the gentleman's committee has undertaken to do? I mean the act as a whole.

Mr. RAYBURN. In the consolidation of section 15a the railroads were represented, labor was represented, the Interstate Commerce Commission was represented, shippers' associations were represented, and every group and every individual who appeared before the committee recommended the repeal of 15a, the recapture clause, and a rewriting of the rule of rate making that we have done in this act.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman be kind enough to yield further at that point?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. COX. What provision, if any, is made for meeting the expenses incurred by the Government in its endeavor to put into effect this recapture clause of the Transportation Act?

Mr. RAYBURN. That expense has been met out of appropriations made by Congress from time to time since 1920.

Now, this bill provides also that where the railroads have paid in this money, it shall be returned to them. I think that is nothing but fair. If we are going to remit the claim against others, it is only fair that those who have tried to comply with the law and who have paid in their money should have it returned.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. GRISWOLD. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the rate-making provision had been rewritten?

Mr. RAYBURN. We have.

Mr. GRISWOLD. In rewriting the rate-making provision was the old principle of basing rates on capital accounts left in?

Mr. RAYBURN. No. As far as we could, in writing the rule on rate making, we tried to write one that would be as nearly as may be a reasonable rate. I will read the rule on rate-making as we have it here:

In the exercise of its power to prescribe a just and reasonable rate the Commission shall give due consideration among other factors to the effect of rates upon the movement of traffic, to the need and the public interest for adequate and efficient railway transportation, to service at the lowest cost consistent with furnishing such service, and to the need of revenues sufficient to enable the carriers under honest, economical, and efficient management to provide such service.

This is what we arrived at after many months of study of the rule of rate making.

Mr. GRISWOLD. To make myself clear, under the old system whatever money was spent by the railroad, even though it was borrowed money, could be considered for rate making and the rate was fixed that would allow a return of 6 percent, even on that borrowed money, which was passed on as part of the increased cost of operation.

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. GRISWOLD. That was the old rate-making rule.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The Interstate Commerce Commission has to pass upon it, does it not?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; but we are laying down at this place a standard for rate making.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. On January 19, 1932, testifying before the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, Commissioner Eastman, of the Interstate Commerce Commission, made the following statement:

On December 17, 1931, the general railroad contingent fund held $13,277,598.50. Of this, $10,717,922.97 represented payments by carriers, and the remainder represented interest accumulations. Of the payments by carriers, $8,796,188.11 was paid under protest, and $1,921,734.86 was paid unconditionally. Of the latter amount, $9,917.72 was paid in whole or in part under final orders of the Commission. Most of the payments have been by small or comparatively small roads. Considerably more than half came from railroads controlled by the iron and steel industry.

I made a computation yesterday, and I discovered that out of the $10,717,922.97 which had been paid in, over $8,000,000 had been paid in by railroads controlled by industries, and the larger part of that by railroads which are controlled by the United States Steel Corporation, the Bethlehem Steel Corporation, and other iron and steel industries.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, in that connection, may I ask a question?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Commissioner, is it possible to make any reasonable estimate—and if so, will you give it to us—as to how much, in your judgment, it would cost to collect the $378,000,000 that the Commission has estimated the railroads owe this recapture fund, and how long it would take to settle the question?

Mr. RAYBURN. I understand that. What question does the gentleman wish to ask?

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. This $8,000,000 paid in by railroads owned by United States Steel and Bethlehem Steel——

Mr. RAYBURN. The testimony you have quoted indicates the sources of these payments.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. Does not the gentleman think, whether or not we retain the recapture clause, that Mr. Morgan would take this $8,000,000 that is given back to him and probably pay some of the income tax he owes for the last 2 or 3 years?

Mr. RAYBURN. I know nothing about that. I may say I have always believed in treating all people exactly alike and playing fair with everyone. If we are going to take away from one, we should take away from all; or if we are going to give back to one, we should give back to all.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. With reference to the capital structure of railroads and valuation, I understand the recent investigation is not complete, but the capital stock is something like $11,000,000,000 and the bonded indebtedness is a little over $13,000,000,000. In other words, since the valuation of 1916, 1918–32 there has been an increase in the capital structure of over $4,000,000,000. Heretofore, at least upon the capital structure, there has never been any thought on the part of the railroads of retiring the bonds.

I wonder if there is any provision in this bill that would permit the Interstate Commerce Commission to compel the railroads to set up a fund to retire the bonded indebtedness of the railroads?

We have paid the bonded indebtedness once over with dividends and interest, but no effort has ever been made to retire the bonds.

Mr. RAYBURN. There is nothing in this act with reference to that.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for 5 additional minutes, which I understand is necessary on account of the fact I have consumed 1 hour.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. I may say in reference to the capital structure: I was very much in favor of an amendment to the Bankruptcy Act that became law in March 1933. I believe a great number of the railroads of the country should take advantage of the operation of that law and go through reorganization and a reduction of their capital structures. I do not see any other hope for them. They cannot refinance, they cannot pay a return on the capital structures they have with a reasonable charge for the service they are rendering.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield? I beg pardon; I realize that the gentleman's time is limited.

Mr. RAYBURN. My time is out; I am going on borrowed time, but I yield to the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. MAY. I read the bill the gentleman introduced here. As I understand the general character of the legislation, it authorizes a temporary suspension of the antitrust laws, that would otherwise affect the railroads. It provides for the consolidation or merger of all of the railroads.

Mr. RAYBURN. Oh, no. That is the law now. We do not change the consolidation provision of the Transportation Act, except to say that they cannot consolidate through the holding companies without the consent of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It was in the law of 1920 and has been the law ever since.

Mr. MAY. As I understand, the consolidations are not permissible under the law by reason of the existence of the antitrust laws.

Mr. RAYBURN. No. The antitrust laws as they affected the consolidation of the railroads were suspended by the act of 1920, where the Commission approves a consolidation.

Mr. MAY. If the gentleman will permit me to finish my question, as I understand the measure it provides for these consolidations and also provides for the appointment of a coordinator to effect the mergers or consolidations.

Mr. RAYBURN. Oh, no. The coordinator has nothing whatever to do with consolidations.

Mr. MAY. Do you create a coordinator?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. MAY. Then the question I wanted to get to, if the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. RAYBURN. I hope I am courteous to the gentleman.

Mr. MAY. I want to inquire if there is any power given the coordinator in the legislation that will enable him to accomplish the purposes of the prior legislation.

Mr. RAYBURN. Not a thing, because the question of consolidation, I will say to my friend from Kentucky, is left where it has been since 1920, with the Interstate Commerce Commission and not with any coordinator.

Mr. MAY. My question was prompted, if my friend from Texas will permit me to say so, by reading the testimony of Mr. Eastman, who testified at the recent hearings of this committee that the coordinator had no power or authority to do anything. My question then is, Why create a coordinator?

Mr. RAYBURN. I will state to the gentleman that it is with reference to consolidations that he does not have anything to do. In connection with a great many other things, he has very much to do with them, because he can issue an order and it goes into effect, and the only power that can set it aside is the court.

Mr. MAY. That is an order pertaining to the action of the committees that may be created by the boards of directors.

Mr. RAYBURN. Or by independent action, he can go over the committee, and he does not have to ask the committee about a great many things he does; but as far as the consolidation provisions in the law are concerned, this bill does not touch them, except with respect to the proposition of control of the holding company. However, the coordinator has nothing whatsoever to do with the question of railroad consolidations, regardless of the debate in the Senate.

Now, I have taken more time than I intended. I have not made as connected a statement as I would like to make, because I yielded to everybody who has asked me to yield.

Mr. MEAD. The gentleman has been very kind and patient, and by reason of the powerful position the gentleman holds, I think it would be well for the record, if the gentleman would explain section 10 (b) with regard to the nullification of State laws and regulations.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for 5 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I shall now ask unanimous consent that I may extend my remarks, and I shall undertake to have in the RECORD in the morning an explanation of each provision of title I, as set forth in the report.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

The analysis is as follows:

ANALYSIS OF TITLE I OF THE BILL

SECTION 1

Section 1 defines the terms "Commission", "coordinator", "committee", "carrier", "employee", and "State commission."

SECTION 2

Section 2 states the purposes of title I, which are to foster and protect interstate commerce in relation to railroad transportation by preventing and relieving obstructions and burdens thereon resulting from the present acute economic emergency and by safeguarding and maintaining an adequate national system of transportation and creates therefor the office of Federal Coordinator of Transportation and provides for his appointment by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, or his designation by the President from the Interstate Commerce Commission.

SECTION 3

Section 3 directs the coordinator to divide the carriers into three regional groups and the carriers in each group to designate five representatives, who shall be the regular members of a regional coordinating committee. The railroads other than class 1 of a region may designate a representative, and the electric railways not owned or controlled by a steam railroad may designate a representative, who shall be special members of the regional coordinating committee.

SECTION 4

Section 4 states the purposes of the title: First, to promote economies and avoid unnecessary waste and preventable expense; second, to promote financial reorganization of the carriers; and, third, to provide for the immediate study of other means of improving conditions surrounding transportation in all its forms and the preparation of plans therefor.

SECTION 5

Section 5 makes it the duty of the committees representing the carriers within each group, and jointly where more than one group is affected, to carry out the provisions of the title; and directs the coordinator to give appropriate directions by order in such instances as the committees are unable for any reason, legal or otherwise, to carry out the purposes of the title by voluntary action.

SECTION 6

Section 6 requires the coordinator to confer freely with these regional committees and to give them the benefit of his advice and assistance. Where a committee fails to act the coordinator may act on his own initiative. The coordinator is empowered to call for information and reports from the committees themselves, the carriers, and the Interstate Commerce Commission. Provision is made in (b) of this section for the Commission to require by subpena the attendance and testimony of witnesses and authorizes the members and examiners of the Commission to administer oaths.

SECTION 7

Section 7 consists of five paragraphs, (a), (b), (c), (d), and (e).

7 (a) authorizes for each regional group of carriers one labor committee representing the standard unions and another labor committee representing other labor organizations which may be designated and authorized to represent employees in accordance with the requirements of the Railway Labor Act. Both the regional coordinating committees representing the carriers and the coordinator are required to give notice to and to confer with the appropriate labor committee or committees, and hear their views prior to taking any action or issuing any order which will affect the interests of the employees.

7 (b) is as follows:

"(b) The number of employees in the service of a carrier shall not be reduced by reason of any action taken pursuant to the authority of this title below the number as shown by the pay rolls of employees in service during the month of May 1933, after deducting the number who have been removed from the pay rolls after the effective date of this act by reason of death, normal retirements, or resignation, but not more in any one year than 5 percent of said number in service during May 1933; nor shall any employee in such service be deprived of employment such as he had during said month of May or be in a worse position with respect to his compensation for such employment, by reason of any action taken pursuant to the authority conferred by this title."

7 (c) requires the coordinator to establish regional boards of adjustment for the settlement of labor disputes, arising under this title, in the manner provided by the Railway Labor Act.

7 (d) provides for compensation to employees for property losses and expenses imposed upon them by reason of transfers of work from one locality to another incident to carrying out the purposes of this title.

7 (e) is drawn to strengthen the enforcement of the Railway Labor Act and discourage the use of "yellow dog" contracts.

SECTION 8

Section 8 provides that not less than 20 days shall elapse after the publication by the coordinator of an order before it becomes effective.

SECTION 9

Section 9 provides that any interested party (including any carrier, shipper, employee, State commission, the Governor of any State, or representative of any political subdivision of a State) may appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission for a review of an order issued by the coordinator. If the Commission grants such a review, it may in its discretion suspend an order if it finds that the immediate enforcement would result in irreparable damage to the petitioner or would work grave injury to the public interest. The Commission is called upon to expedite its hearings if it suspends an order.

SECTION 10

Section 10 provides for the suspension of the antitrust laws and of all other restrictions or prohibitions of State or Federal authority except laws for the protection of the public health or safety and the requirements of the Railway Labor Act so far as necessary to carry out orders issued under this title. (b) of this section requires the coordinator to advise a State commission or the Governor of a State before he issues any order relieving any carrier from the operation of a law of the State or an order of the State commission.

SECTION 11

Section 11 provides that nothing may be done under this title to relieve any carrier from any contractual obligations which it may have assumed with regard to the location or maintenance of offices, shops, or roundhouses, at any point.

SECTION 12

Section 12 provides for penalties of not less than $1,000 or more than $20,000 for each day that an order of the coordinator is violated by a carrier, or any officer or employee of a carrier. It further provides that no one may be required by such an order to render labor or service without his consent.

SECTION 13

Section 13 directs the coordinator to investigate and consider means not provided for in this title of improving transportation conditions throughout the country. It is drawn to carry out the third purpose of the title as stated in section 4.

SECTION 14

Section 14 provides that the expenses of the coordinator shall be borne from a fund to be collected from the carriers on the basis of $2 for every mile of road operated on December 31, 1932, and provides that the coordinator and members of his staff may receive free transportation from the railroad and Pullman companies.

SECTION 15

Section 15 is drawn to carry out the second purpose of the title as stated in section 4. The Commission shall not approve a loan to a carrier under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act as amended if it is of the opinion that the public interest requires the financial reorganization of the company, provided that this limitation does not apply to a receiver or trustee of a carrier.

SECTION 16

Section 16 provides for court review of orders and for expediting the determination of questions taken to the courts.

SECTION 17

Section 17 provides that this title shall cease to have effect at the end of 1 year unless extended by proclamation of the President for 1 year or any part thereof. Orders of the coordinator or the Commission made under this title shall continue in effect until vacated by the Commission or set aside by other lawful authority.

Mr. RAYBURN. I am going to close in about a minute, because I have been living with the securities bill and this bill for the past 8 weeks.

It is our hope that under this bill economies may be effected that will respond in relief to the masses of the people and yet not be burdensome on any group or upon any class. It is our intention in this legislation to be fair not only to those who work for the railroads, to those who own the railroads, but also to remember the more than 100,000,000 people of this country who neither work for the railroads nor own any stock in any railroads. I think sometimes in our enthusiasm for some group or from our knowledge of what some group wants that is represented by able lawyers and able laymen, we sometimes forget that vast body of people lying out there who are not vocal and cannot be heard except through their Representatives on the floor of the House of Representatives.

In the writing of railroad legislation it has always been my hope to punish nobody, to give nobody an unreasonable reward, but to write such laws as will be effective, having an eye single to the one great big thing, and that is the public interest. [Applause.] I thank you.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 30 minutes.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Texas has just made a most excellent explanation of this bill, which is probably as complicated and as complex a bill as ever came before the Congress of the United States. The gentleman from Texas and myself have been on this committee for 20 years, and if there is anything more complex than the rate-making structure of the railroad systems I do not know what it is, and this measure goes to the very heart of the rate-making structure of the country.

I want to take a little different tack in explaining this bill, and before I proceed further I want to say that if this bill is not amended out of all reason I expect to support it, and support it heartily. I want to take up now the question of who owns and controls the railroads.

We are very apt here to have House Members speak of the railroads as an entity, and we confound management and ownership. I want to repeat that—we confound management and ownership.

I want to point out to you that the management—the people whom you call the railroads—have very little financial interest in the railroad itself. The men who are running the railroads, the presidents, the vice presidents, and the managers and directors, in percentage have very little financial interest in the railroads. They are as much hired men for the stockholders as the engine driver or the conductor or the brakeman.

They are running these roads for the stockholders.

Now, I will take these roads at random. Take, for instance, the New York Central; there are 54,000 stockholders in the New York Central Railroad. There is only one of the largest stockholders on the board of directors. The 30 largest stockholders in the New York Central Railroad control but about 12 percent of the voting stock of the road. Neither the directors, the president of the road, nor the vice president figure as heavy stockholders.

The figures I am quoting from are taken from the report that the chairman of the committee referred to as the "Dr. Splawn report", made when I was chairman of the committee.

Now, take a western road. Take the Illinois Central. There are over 20,000 stockholders in that road. There are but 2 directors in the Illinois Central among the 30 largest stockholders.

It is interesting to note that in the 30 largest stockholders they hold less than 8 percent of the stock. Your insurance companies hold 2 percent of that same stock.

As I say, the 30 largest individual stockholders only control 8 percent of the stock, and there are only 2 directors in the Illinois Central on the board among the 30 largest stockholders.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. Does the gentleman mean the stockholders themselves or the stockholders and the bondholders?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I am not referring to the bondholders; they have no vote.

Mr. PARSONS. And the gentleman says that the insurance companies hold 2 percent of the stock of the Illinois Central?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes; this condition runs right through all the roads as far as the ownership or management is concerned. I am not taking up the rest, but I assure you they all run about the same.

The managers of the roads do not own the railroads. It aggravates me to death to have gentlemen stand on the floor and discuss the railroad as an entity. The railroads are not an entity, they are roads owned by the people. There are about 500,000 stockholders of railroads in the United States. They constitute the railroads, the management does not.

General Atterbury does not own the Pennsylvania Railroad, he is simply a hired man of the stockholders of the Pennsylvania Railroad.

Mr. DUNN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARSONS. I will.

Mr. DUNN. What is the value of all the railroads in the United States?

Mr. PARKER of New York. That is a very hard matter to arrive at. In the last computation I saw, that of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the value was between twenty-two and twenty-three billion dollars.

When we passed the law in 1914 to value the railroads, everybody thought that the railroads were very much overcapitalized; but it was not long before they saw that most of the roads were undercapitalized in the aggregate.

I agree with the gentleman from Texas, the chairman of the committee, who preceded me, that during the depression things have gone down and the railroads must reorganize, must cut down fixed charges for the sake of furnishing transportation at a reasonable rate to the public.

The gentleman spoke about the bonds. Allow me to say that there are $12,000,000,000 of bonds of the railroads outstanding of all kinds. Of these twelve billion, $6,600,000,000 are owned by public institutions and quasi-public institutions. When I say quasi-public institutions, I mean insurance companies, both life and fire. They are owned by savings banks and educational institutions and institutions of that kind. They are not held by these institutions for profit but for investment. Very few bonds of railroads are owned by these institutions that are held not for profit but for revenue which is used for the benefit of the public. Insurance companies hold their bonds primarily for the benefit of the policyholders. Of course, in educational institutions it is the same way.

I want now to say a word about the recapture clause, which is going to be, I presume, the most controversial section of the bill. There seems to be a prevailing impression among the Membership of the House that this money that was recaptured belongs to the Government. It does not and never did belong to the Government. It belongs to the railroads. It is put into a revolving fund, never to be spent by the Government for governmental purposes, but to be loaned to other railroads that need financial help. You often hear gentlemen say that we are taking money out of the Treasury, the taxpayers' money, and giving it back to the railroads. That is untrue as anything could possibly be, because the act of 1920 created a revolving fund, to be half of the money over 6 percent earned by the railroads.

All of the large roads practically have not paid the recapture. We have spent $90,000,000 valuing the railroads. I want to pay my compliments to the Interstate Commerce Commission. They have proceeded with all the diligence possible to value the railroads, but when you stop to think of the thousands and thousands of miles of railroads and the different accessories that go with railroads, you will see that it is a task that is tremendous. They have not yet been able to complete it.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Will the hearings disclose what roads have paid money into that revolving fund?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes; I thought I had that here, but I have not. I will refer to that under the 5-minute rule. Outside of one big steel road, all the money was practically paid by the small roads.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Do the hearings also disclose what roads are indebted to the Government for money borrowed from the Finance Corporation?

Mr. PARKER of New York. No; we are not discussing that at all.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Is it the purpose of the committee to recommend the payment out of this revolving fund of amounts due from the roads that have borrowed from the Government through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation?

Mr. PARKER of New York. No. I want to repeat what the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] said. You cannot make fish of one and fowl of another. If we are going to relieve the roads that have not paid, we should pay back to the roads that have paid. That is a fair proposition. You may be against the whole proposition, but you cannot be for one class and not be for the other, because it is not fair. This money never went into the Treasury for the use of the Federal Government. It went into the Treasury as a revolving fund. The railroads were valued, as I say, fairly completely. The O'Fallon case was brought as a test case before the Supreme Court of the United States. We expended $90,000,000 to value the railroads. In the O'Fallon case the Supreme Court said that the formula that the Interstate Commerce Commission had used was wrong; that their valuation was wrong. Therefore you have to start valuation all over again if you are going into this recapture business, and value the railroads all over again on the formula laid down and enunciated by the Supreme Court of the United States, which will cost millions and millions of dollars to do. The valuation that we have now is all right for rate making. So long as they used the valuation for rate making, you never heard any particular complaint. It was a success, because it was a tentative value. I mean before we passed the act of 1920, when all the railroads had to depend on for redress was the confiscation clause of the Constitution—6 percent or a fair return on the money invested. Up to that time there had never been any particular complaint about the value put on the railroads by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes.

Mr. MAY. Under the Transportation Act of 1920, which created the recapture clause, the purpose, as I understood the legislation, was to enable the weaker railroads, by reason of their lack of earning capacity, to be financed with the funds earned by those who had greater earnings, and in that way provide for uniform rates.

Mr. PARKER of New York. That is the theory.

Mr. MAY. In other words, carriers who were able to make a larger return in excess of 6 percent could go on a lower rate and thus in effect raise the rate of the small roads, because it would naturally drive the business away from the smaller roads to the larger.

Mr. PARKER of New York. That is correct. That was the theory of it.

Mr. MAY. In view of that, I should like to ask the gentleman whether he has read the opinion of the Supreme Court in the case of Dayton-Goose Creek Railroad Co. v. United States (263 U. S. 456), where they laid down the following doctrine:

> By the recapture clauses Congress is enabled to maintain uniform rates of shippers and yet keep the net return of railroads, whether strong or weak, to the varying percentages which are fair, respectively, for them. The recapture clauses are thus the key provision of the whole plan.

Mr. PARKER of New York. That is true.

Mr. MAY. In view of that statement by the highest court of the land, I should like the gentleman to explain just how the bill is going to relieve the railroads.

Mr. PARKER of New York. The theory under which 15a was written in the law of 1920 was the theory of value. This bill is not written on the theory of value. The theory on which the Transportation Act was written, as explained by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], was to insure all railroads 6-percent interest. This is on the theory of a reasonable return; not a fixed, hard-and-fast return. The theory of this bill is to allow railroads to earn more than they should in good years to be able to tide them over in bad years, so that we will not need a Reconstruction Finance Corporation to stop them from going into bankruptcy.

Mr. MAY. Of course, we all realize the importance of the railroads to the country as a transportation agency; and the fact that their securities are held by all the institutions which the gentleman has mentioned makes it important to take care of them, but I should like to ask the gentleman if he has given attention to the legal question as to whether or not the ten or twelve million dollars paid into the Treasury constitutes a Treasury fund and cannot be legislated out to the railroads by Congress?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Oh, I would not say it could not be legislated out.

Mr. MAY. But it is a fund in the Treasury to be appropriated to private industry.

Mr. PARKER of New York. It is a fund in the Treasury segregated to a particular use. I do not have any doubt Congress could do anything it wanted with that fund.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I yield.

Mr. WHITTINGTON. Approximately how much has the Government spent in valuing the railroads?

Mr. PARKER of New York. About $90,000,000; and it has been perfectly useless.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I yield.

Mr. PARSONS. The gentleman made a statement a few minutes ago that after the valuations were made up it was learned that the railroads were not so very much overcapitalized.

Mr. PARKER of New York. That is true.

Mr. PARSONS. The valuation that was made in 1916 and 1918 placed a valuation of approximately $15,500,000,000, but the railroads claimed a capital structure at that time of approximately $20,000,000,000.

Mr. PARKER of New York. The last figures I saw from the Interstate Commerce Commission reckoned the capitalization at about $21,000,000,000.

Mr. PARSONS. The railroads have a capital structure at this time of between twenty-four and twenty-five billion.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. Commissioner Eastman, if I am not mistaken, made a statement substantially that they were about three and a half or four billion dollars overcapitalized.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes; that is true.

Mr. PARSONS. In view of the two valuations, 1918 and 1930, the bonds and capital structure have increased $4,000,000,000 with no effort ever having been made to retire a single bond that was issued against the railroads.

Mr. PARKER of New York. In answer to the gentleman's question, I may state if the gentleman had studied and lived with the Interstate Commerce Act as long as we have, he would realize some of the difficulties confronting us. For instance, the bookkeeping of the railroads is absolutely set down by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. PARSONS. I understand that.

Mr. PARKER of New York. They must charge to capital account every single improvement and every betterment.

Mr. PARSONS. Certain portions of them.

Mr. PARKER of New York. No; all of them. They cannot charge it to operating expense. That is according to law. They cannot charge betterments and improvements to operating expense, for the reason that if they did that they could raise their rates. That is the reason for it. The capital of the railroads has increased since the war almost $6,000,000,000, and that money has been spent, every dollar of it, with the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. PARSONS. Will the gentleman yield right there for a brief question?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. During the period from 1911 to 1930 the railroads paid dividends to the extent of $7,500,000,000 approximately, and interest on their bonds to the extent of $9,500,000,000 approximately.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. That is about the total value of the railroads in 1918. They have made no effort whatsoever during the fat years to retire a single bond, in order to be able to reduce the rate structure. Does the gentleman believe that refunding operations should be forced on the railroads by the Interstate Commerce Commission to retire bonded structure?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I do not think constitutionally it can be done.

Mr. PARSONS. Well, the gentleman knows we have given the Interstate Commerce Commission wide powers to handle the railroads as a father handles his child, almost.

Mr. PARKER of New York. That is true.

Mr. PARSONS. If we can give them all those powers, certainly the Interstate Commerce Commission could make the railroads set up a refunding operation to retire their bonded structure.

Mr. PARKER of New York. In answer to the gentleman, I may say it is very easy to do what the gentleman wants to do. If a railroad wants to go through the process of reorganization under the bankruptcy law and reduce its capital stock, they have a perfect right to do it, but I doubt very much if the Federal Government has a right to throw a private corporation into bankruptcy, under the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I yield.

Mr. GOSS. If we have a Federal coordinator and it is set up as contemplated under the terms of this bill, can the distinguished gentleman tell us, or has he heard how much saving may be made to the railroads as outlined by the coordinator?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I have heard various estimates, and they varied to such a degree that I would not try to make an estimate of my own.

Mr. GOSS. Then, as I understand it, there is really no sound estimate anywhere of savings made by the railroads?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Does the gentleman want my own personal opinion?

Mr. GOSS. I should like the gentleman's opinion or the opinion of any other he would like to quote.

Mr. PARKER of New York. My own personal opinion is this: The most valuable thing in title I is the section that instructs the coordinator to make a very careful study of everything that can be done and report back to Congress for future legislation. In my judgment, that is the most important thing there is in title I.

Mr. GOSS. But the gentleman does not contemplate any real savings, then?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I hope there will be.

Mr. GOSS. Now, I notice in connection with terminal facilities that about 30 percent of the freight revenue of the four largest railroads is in the hauling of coal which does not pass through terminal facilities to any great extent. Therefore 30 percent of the revenues of the railroads are eliminated from any savings, in any event, practically. I wish somebody, somewhere in this debate, would be able to tell us how much saving there will be by this coordinator. It is a terrible price to pay to put a coordinator in if there is going to be no saving made under the terms of the bill.

Mr. PARKER of New York. I will simply say that if my information is correct, the railroads are going to pay for the coordinator and for all of his help. They are going to be charged $2 a mile.

Mr. GOSS. Is it not $1 a mile?

Mr. PARKER of New York. No; the bill provides $2 a mile.

Mr. GOSS. That will bring in approximately $500,000.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes; and if my understanding is correct, the railroads do not object to this proposition.

Mr. GOSS. I do not mean cost in dollars and cents so much as I do the tremendous power given him and what he may do. If we have not got any real savings in sight, why put him in?

Mr. PARKER of New York. We hope to get real savings.

Mr. GOSS. That is what I am getting at. How much is it estimated to be?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I have no more idea than has the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. GOSS. And no one else has.

Mr. PARKER of New York. And no one else has.

Mr. MAY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I yield.

Mr. MAY. I take it the bill is for the benefit of the railroads and I am interested in knowing——

Mr. PARKER of New York. Oh, no, no; that is not a correct statement.

Mr. MAY. That it is not for the interest of the railroads?

Mr. PARKER of New York. The gentleman speaks as though that were the only interest.

Mr. MAY. Not the only one, of course.

Mr. PARKER of New York. That is one interest; yes.

Mr. MAY. Is not the purpose of the legislation to benefit the railroads?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes; and to benefit the shippers and the employees.

Mr. MAY. Certainly.

Mr. PARKER of New York. All right. I ask the gentleman to include that in any question he wishes to ask me. Be fair about it.

Mr. MAY. I will ask this question, then: Does the gentleman find from the hearings in the consideration of this bill that there is going to be a lot of mergers and elimination of transportation facilities over the country; and, if so, to what extent does he find this is apt to occur?

Mr. PARKER of New York. That is a question we can eliminate now under order of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. MAY. It cannot be done except with permission of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. PARKER of New York. They cannot eliminate further facilities under this bill than they can at the present time.

Mr. MAY. If they cannot, then why not let the Interstate Commerce Commission handle it without the bill?

Mr. PARKER of New York. In the final analysis, it will go to the Interstate Commerce Commission, anyway; because if out in the gentleman's district the coordinator should issue an order that one of his little "jerkwater" lines, such as I have in my district, was to be abandoned, his people would rise up in arms and they would appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission, which they have the right to do, and the order would be set aside. So, in the final analysis, it all comes down to the Interstate Commerce Commission, the same as it is now. However, I do believe much saving will be brought about through agreements made between the railroads through the good offices of the coordinator acting as a mediator.

Mr. MAY. Then the real object or purpose of the bill is to see what can be done in the way of economies?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I think that is the greatest object, yes; but I think many other things will be done. For instance, to give the gentleman an illustration, I most certainly hope they will do something that will reduce the number of trains between New York and Chicago, and something which will bring about the unification of terminals. I hope something can be done to reduce the number of trains between Washington and New York, and that both the Baltimore & Ohio and Pennsylvania may be able to use the same terminal. But to do this they have got to take care of the labor. We have taken care of the labor end of it, but still it costs a tremendous amount of money to run these fast trains. I have gone to New York frequently when there have not been more than half a dozen people on the train. It is uneconomical to run a train under such conditions.

Our theory has been uniform rates established by the Commission. If you are going from here to Chicago, it does not make one dime of difference what road you go over, your fare is exactly the same. If you go from here to New York, whether you go by Baltimore & Ohio or Pennsylvania, your fare is exactly the same.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 15 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. LLOYD). The gentleman from New York is recognized for an additional 15 minutes.

Mr. PARKER of New York. If you are going from here to St. Louis, it makes absolutely no difference which way you go, you pay the same fare. Our theory has been to foster competition, and this competition has been ruinously expensive. We are trying our best in this bill to cut out some of this ruinous, expensive competition, thus to bring about economies which will be reflected in both passenger and freight rates. I think I have answered the gentleman's question.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I yield.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. The gentleman said there would be elimination of terminals. Unification of terminals is provided.

Mr. PARKER of New York. I meant combination, not elimination.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. In what respect does this benefit the employees of the railroads over the present operation of the systems?

Mr. PARKER of New York. The law carries with it a provision that the railroad employees shall not be reduced below a certain percentage. As the gentleman from Texas very well explained, the natural reduction is 5 percent. That is 50,000. Now, they cannot be reduced more than 50,000, the ordinary reduction from natural causes.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. Does the gentleman think it is a benefit to the employees to provide for a reduction in their number by 50,000?

Mr. PARKER of New York. It is the employees' own proposition.

Mr. MEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I yield.

Mr. MEAD. I may say to my colleague from New York that the members of his committee have been very sympathetic so far as the employees are concerned, and I hope that every amendment that was adopted in the Senate, together with those same amendments that were adopted in the committee, are placed in the bill. However, we must not lose sight of the fact that labor is called upon to make a tremendous sacrifice in accepting this bill when we consider the fact that in 1920 there were over 2,000,000 railroad employees and today there are less than 1,000,000, and that by this bill we arbitrarily prevent the future employment of those men who are now furloughed or dismissed because the slack can be taken up by perfecting economies which will be authorized and approved by the coordinator and the Commission.

Mr. PARKER of New York. That is possible.

Mr. MEAD. So while your committee has been very patient and very sympathetic, we must not lose sight of the fact that in the industrial control bill we are creating employment, while in this bill we are preventing employment.

Mr. PARKER of New York. I will not agree with the gentleman that we are preventing employment.

Mr. MEAD. At least in part, the gentleman will agree.

Mr. PARKER of New York. No; I will not even go that far. We are freezing it or we are holding it just where it is. It would go down 5 percent anyway and we are not exceeding the natural reduction.

Mr. SNYDER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I yield.

Mr. SNYDER. The gentleman said that the employment would remain as of May 1933.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes.

Mr. SNYDER. Let us assume that within a year business picks up so they would have to take on one third more employees; would they take these men that are now furloughed, or could they hire anyone?

Mr. PARKER of New York. That is a question I could not answer, because I do not happen to belong to the brotherhoods and do not know what their rules are. I assume they are all on a list and will be taken on in the order of their seniority.

Mr. SNYDER. Does this bill affect that?

Mr. PARKER of New York. This bill does not affect that, because that has nothing to do with us at all. That is an agreement between the railroads and their employees. The men who are furloughed are the men farthest down the list, and I assume the brotherhoods will see to it that the men who are put back are the men at the top of the list, until they get them all back. This bill does not affect that at all, because that is a private agreement.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I yield.

Mr. WOOD of Missouri. I may say that insofar as the railroad brotherhoods are concerned, the rule of seniority prevails, but insofar as these so-called "independent unions" are concerned, seniority does not prevail, and it is a question whether they will get back to work or not.

Mr. PARKER of New York. I have, perhaps, a little more faith than the gentleman has in fair play. My experience in life has been that the majority of the people play the game of life fairly, and I believe that if a man has been a good employee he will be taken back. If you have some employee who was unsatisfactory, I do not believe such people will be taken back if they can help it. Let us be fair about it.

Mr. PIERCE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes.

Mr. PIERCE. Have a large number of the railroads paid dividends on their stock?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Very few of them.

Mr. PIERCE. Or interest on their bonds?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Oh, they have to do that.

Mr. PIERCE. They have all paid the interest on their bonds?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Oh, no; but those who have not have gone into the hands of receivers. They go into the receivership when they do not pay the interest on their bonds.

Mr. PIERCE. What percentage of them?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Quite a few of the big lines.

Mr. PIERCE. What proportion of the big lines have paid dividends on their stock?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Very, very few of them.

Mr. PIERCE. But they have paid the interest on their bonds?

Mr. PARKER of New York. They have paid their interest, yes.

Mr. PIERCE. And the bonds represent practically the investment?

Mr. PARKER of New York. No; they do not, in most cases. For instance, in my own State of New York, under the law we have a preferred list of bonds that trusts can buy—one of the primary clauses in that law is that the moment the bond defaults it goes off of that preferred list—a list of bonds that savings banks can buy and trust companies can buy and insurance companies can buy. The minute they default they go off that list and they have got to be thrown on the market and sold.

Mr. PIERCE. Is it not true that the railroads received their deathblow when the truck came, except for long hauls?

Mr. PARKER of New York. No; I do not think it was a deathblow. I think they received a very hard jolt in the jaw, but I do not think it is a deathblow. I think they will survive. I think they are wounded and wounded badly, but I think they will survive.

Mr. BIERMANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I yield.

Mr. BIERMANN. Has this bill, as the House committee has written it, been approved by the railroad brotherhoods?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Absolutely, so far as I know. I was not in the conference because I belong on the other side of the House, but I was in a conference afterward, and my understanding is that they did approve it verbatim.

Mr. BIERMANN. Then a vote for the House bill is a vote in accordance with the expression of the railroad brotherhoods?

Mr. PARKER of New York. That is my understanding. I do not say it is, but I say that is what I believe, and I have reason to believe that that is true. However, when you get a thing second-hand you cannot make a definite statement that it is so. The gentleman told me, I believe told me the truth, and they told me it was acceptable to labor.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. Under the coordinator section, subsection (2) of section 4, I find this language:

> To promote financial reorganization of the carriers, with due regard to legal rights, so as to reduce fixed charges to the extent required by the public interest and improve carrier credit.

Is this language sufficiently broad so that the coordinator may sell any of the terminal rights of a railroad to improve carrier credit and have that claim put on the Government?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Not a bit of it; no.

Mr. GOSS. What is meant by that language?

Mr. PARKER of New York. What is meant by that is that if you can get 2 or 3 roads together and they can agree, all right; you can then go through with it, and the coordinator will put his order through.

Mr. GOSS. But this is under the coordinator section.

Mr. PARKER of New York. I grant you that; but to illustrate, he will do just what I stated a moment ago. He will get the Pennsylvania and the Baltimore & Ohio together and try to make them use the Pennsylvania terminal; but, of course, the Baltimore & Ohio will have to pay for it.

Mr. GOSS. That would not be decreasing the fixed charges one bit.

Mr. PARKER of New York. I do not know whether it would or not. It would stop the Baltimore & Ohio from running those ferries and running all those busses which they now run in New York City.

Mr. GOSS. The gentleman has admitted that you can not cut down on the employees. Suppose you had four tugs on the Hudson River and you wanted to cut down, how can you decrease the fixed charges? It cannot be done.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes; it can be done; you can cut out the running of the ferries between New York and Jersey City.

Mr. GOSS. But you would only save the fuel; you would have to pay the men, and you would have to pay the interest on the cost of the tugs.

Mr. PARKER of New York. But you could sell the tugs.

Mr. GOSS. Well, if you can sell the tugs, why cannot you sell the terminals?

Mr. PARKER of New York. If they agree to it; yes. They could do that now.

Mr. GOSS. Can the coordinator put any claim on the Federal Government?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Absolutely no; the Federal Government is not liable for a single thing the coordinator does. The regional board, consisting of seven directors for the eastern, western, and southern divisions, can get together, and if they agree, all well and good; and if the coordinator can be of any help, well and good. If there is anything advantageous to do, he orders them to do it, and they have to do it, although they have the power to appeal, both to the Interstate Commerce Commission and to the courts.

Now, why is the coordinator authorized; why do we put the coordinator in the picture? Because the regional boards cannot do anything contrary to the antitrust law. The coordinator can. If he should see that it was advantageous to abandon a certain line that parallels another, he could order it done, subject, of course, to the final decision of the Interstate Commerce Commission. But the railroads themselves could not do it. That is the plain statement of facts.

Now, I certainly hope when we come to consider the bill under the 5-minute rule that you will accept the bill pretty much as it is.

As I said at the outset, this is one of the most complicated bills that you can imagine. A change in one line here on this page means the change perhaps in the phraseology three sections farther on. A person who has not studied the question thoroughly is embarking on a dangerous procedure when he attempts to amend a bill of this kind.

Now, do not misunderstand me. The House is just as intelligent as the committee, but they have not had the time, they have not had the opportunity to study the bill as we have.

Mrs. McCARTHY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I yield.

Mrs. McCARTHY. The gentleman made the statement that if the railroads did not pay the dividends they would go into the hands of a receiver.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Oh, no. I said if they did not pay the interest on the bonds.

Mrs. McCARTHY. Is it not true that the railroads have borrowed from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation money to pay interest on the bonds?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes.

Mrs. McCARTHY. Is it not true that thereby their debts will be increased?

Mr. PARKER of New York. We hope they will be lessened. Let me say that these bonds are largely held by the public institutions; and if their bonds should be thrown upon the market, you know what it means, if they were thrown on the market in large quantities. That is the reason the Reconstruction Finance Corporation came to the rescue of the railroads to a large extent—to keep them in a solvent condition so that their bonds could be used as trust funds.

Mrs. McCARTHY. Is it not true that when they begin to borrow money to pay interest on their bonds that eventually they go into the hands of a receiver?

Mr. PARKER of New York. That is a question of course. There is a difference of opinion, but history has a queer way of repeating itself. In 1920 the railroads were in almost as bad condition as they are today. We loaned the railroads in 1920, through the War Finance Corporation, a billion and a half dollars. Every dollar of that has been paid back except $38,000,000, and that $38,000,000 was owed by small railroads that have gone into the hands of receivers and finally out of business. The Government made on that transaction over $200,000,000 profit. That seems incredible, but nevertheless it is true. We charged the railroads 6 percent on the borrowed money, borrowed the money from the people at 4 percent. The difference between the 6-percent and the 4-percent interest made a profit to the Government of something over $200,000,000, charging off, of course, the $38,000,000 that we did not get returned.

Mrs. McCARTHY. I want to know if all groups of employees are taken care of under this bill?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Absolutely.

Mrs. McCARTHY. There was an amendment added to the bill in the Senate that provided only for employees that entered into certain agreements in Chicago.

Mr. PARKER of New York. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] explained that. We have broadened that to allow the representation of all labor groups.

Mrs. McCARTHY. Then the shopworkers are taken care of?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. PARKER of New York. Yes.

Mr. BROWN of Kentucky. Can the gentleman tell us how much of the money loaned by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation last year and this year has been paid back?

Mr. PARKER of New York. I could not say.

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Chairman, I have received a great many letters and communications from railway organizations in Detroit protesting against the labor provision in the Senate bill and asking me to support an amendment proposed by labor. Can the gentleman tell the House whether or not there has been an agreement reached whereby that objectionable clause would be eliminated?

Mr. PARKER of New York. There has been an agreement reached, as I understand it, which is entirely satisfactory to all classes of railway labor.

Mr. DONDERO. And that is included in this bill?

Mr. PARKER of New York. That is included in an amendment that we will have in the bill and which we will read tomorrow.

Mr. LAMNECK. Mr. Chairman, I am interested in the elimination of so-called "duplicate service", and I am told that one plan proposed is to tear up the Baltimore & Ohio tracks from here up to New York and run all the service over the Pennsylvania Railroad.

Mr. PARKER of New York. I never heard of that.

Mr. LAMNECK. The bill provides that the coordinator shall pick out places where they have duplicate service and eliminate tracks, and so forth. I understand that is one of the proposals.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Oh, no. I do not think that is the proposal at all. I do not think a road like the Baltimore & Ohio would ever be torn up.

Mr. LAMNECK. It is a duplicate service.

Mr. PARKER of New York. What I meant by duplicate service was this: Take 2 trains leaving the Union Station here at 3 o'clock, 1 on the Pennsylvania and 1 on the Baltimore & Ohio, 20 feet apart. That is what I meant by duplicate service.

Mr. DOBBINS. The gentleman stated that the changes made by the committee here suited all classes of labor.

Mr. PARKER of New York. That is my understanding.

Mr. DOBBINS. Does that suit the so-called "company unions"?

Mr. PARKER of New York. That is my understanding, that was our intention. I thank the members of the committee. [Applause.]

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. MILLIGAN].

Mr. MILLIGAN. I propose in my time to go in detail into some of the provisions of the bill, because of the fact that Members have only had the bill before them for a very short time.

This bill has three purposes: First, to create a Federal coordinator of transportation to be appointed by the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate, unless a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission is appointed to act in this capacity; in such case it does not require confirmation of the coordinator due to the fact he has already been confirmed by the Senate as a member of the Commission.

The coordinator is directed to divide the carriers into three groups; namely, the eastern group, the southern group, and the western group. The coordinator is also authorized to designate three regional coordinating committees composed of 5 regular members and 2 special members; 1 of the special members representing railroads which in 1932 had operating revenues of less than $1,000,000, the other special member representing the electric railroads within the group not owned by the steam railroads or operated as a part of the general steam-railroad system. These special members are to be called in when the interests of their different groups are under consideration. The duties of the coordinator are to encourage, promote, and require action on the part of the carriers in order to prevent duplication of services and facilities of any nature and to permit the joint use of terminals and trackage, to control allowances, accessorial services, and other practices affecting services or operations to the end that undue impairment of net earnings may be prevented in order to avoid waste and prevent extravagances; to promote financial reorganization of the carriers with due regard to legal rights so as to reduce fixed charges to the extent required by the public interest and improve the carrier credit; to provide for the study of other means of improved conditions surrounding transportation in all its forms and prepare a plan with this view.

The duties of the committees set out in this act on their own initiative, within each group, are to make recommendations to the coordinator to carry out the purposes mentioned above. The coordinator is to confer freely with these committees and give them the benefit of his advice and assistance.

A labor committee for each regional group of carriers may be selected for those railroad-labor organizations which are designated and authorized to act in accordance with the Railroad Labor Act that entered into agreement on January 31, 1932, and December 21, 1932, with the duly authorized representatives of the carriers as to wages. A similar committee is created for each regional group of carriers by other railroad-labor organizations as are designated and authorized to represent employees in accordance with the Railroad Labor Act. The coordinator must give reasonable notice and confer with the appropriate regional committee or committees on the subject matter prior to taking any action which affects the interests of the employees in order to afford the regional labor committee an opportunity to present their views on the contemplated action or order.

The bill also provides that the number of employees in the service of the carriers shall not be reduced by any action taken under title I of this bill below the number shown by the pay rolls during the month of May 1933, deducting from the pay rolls the number reduced by reason of death, retirement, or resignation, but not more than 5 percent of said number in any one year. No employee can be deprived of employment such as he had during the month of May 1933, or his compensation for such employment by authority conferred in title I.

The coordinator is directed to establish regional boards of adjustment to settle controversies between carriers and employees, and the carrier and the employees shall be equally represented on such board for settlement of controversies. These boards are to function as the boards of adjustment provided by the Railroad Labor Act.

The coordinator is further directed to provide means for determining the amount of damage and require the carriers to make just compensation for property loss and expense brought on the employees by reason of transferring such employees from one locality to another.

Any order that may be issued by the coordinator shall be made public not less than 20 days before the order becomes effective. Such order made by the coordinator may be suspended or set aside by the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is also provided that any interested party dissatisfied by the order issued by the coordinator may, within the 20 days, file a petition with the Commission asking that such order be reviewed and suspended pending such review.

If the Commission, after considering the petition and answer, has reason to believe the order to be unjust to the petitioner or against the public interest, the Commission may grant a review and, in its discretion, suspend the order if they find immediate enforcement of such order would result in irreparable damage to the petitioner or work a detriment to the public interest. However, if the Commission suspends an order, it shall expedite the hearing and decision, giving due notice and a public hearing, review the order, and take such action as it may seem to them just and consistent with the public interest—either confirm the order, set it aside, or reissue it in a modified form. Any final order that is made shall be subject to the same rights of relief in court by any party in interest as is provided in respect to orders of the Commission made under the Interstate Commerce Act.

The orders of the Commission or the coordinator are to remain in effect until set aside by the coordinator, the Commission, or the Congress.

The carriers affected by any order of the coordinator or the Commission are relieved from the operation of the antitrust laws and other restrictions or prohibitions by law of the State or Federal Governments as may be necessary to carry out such order, the exceptions being laws of public health and safety and the Railroad Labor Act.

Where the coordinator issues an order relieving the carrier from the operation of any State law or of the order of any State commission, he shall advise the Governor or the commission of that State that such order is contemplated, in order to afford the State authorities opportunity to present their views relative to the contemplated order.

Title I does not relieve any carrier from any contractual obligation which it may have assumed prior to this law with regard to the location and maintenance of offices or shops at any particular place.

Any officer or carrier willfully failing or refusing to carry out any order issued by the coordinator or the Commission under this act is deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction is subject to fine of not less than $1,000 or more than $20,000 for each offense each day during which time said carrier or person willfully fails or refuses to comply with such order.

No authority is given in this act to require any employee or officer or group thereof to render labor or services without his or their consent, and no order requiring such service or making illegal the failure or refusal of employees to render such services shall be legal.

It is provided that within 30 days after the enactment of this bill and for the first year of operation $2 for each mile of railroad operated on December 31, 1932, shall be paid by the carrier to pay the expense of carrying out the provisions of this act.

It is provided that title I of this act shall cease to be effective at the end of 1 year, unless extended by a proclamation of the President for 1 year or any part thereof. However, it is provided that an order of the coordinator or the Commission shall continue in effect until set aside by lawful authority, but no order shall be operative to relieve any carrier from the effect of any State law or order of a State commission made after this title ceases to have effect.

Title II of this bill provides in part for the regulation of railroad holding companies under the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Under the Interstate Commerce Act the Interstate Commerce Commission was directed to prepare and adopt a plan for the consolidation of railway properties of the United States into a limited number of systems.

During the process of developing this plan the Commission found that certain interests, through holding companies, had been acquiring control of certain railroad lines. As a result, the Commission in its annual report of 1929 made the following statement:

> The subjection of the unification of carriers by railroad to the orderly processes of a carefully planned scheme of public regulation, which section 5 was designed to accomplish, is very likely to be partially or even wholly defeated, subject to the possibility that the Clayton Antitrust Act may in some measure, after protracted litigation, enable control over the situation to be maintained.

The Commission also made the following recommendation to Congress:

> That in view of the fact that the acquisition of control or of an amount of stock sufficient to influence the policies of competing railroads, either by individuals or other noncarrier corporations, may result in the suppression of competition, consideration should now be given by the Congress to possible legislation.

As a result of this statement and recommendation by the Commission, the House of Representatives passed a resolution in the Seventy-first Congress authorizing and directing the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce to conduct a thorough investigation of the holding-company situation as related to railroads. This was done, and a complete and comprehensive report was made by the committee.

This investigation developed that although application for the unification of certain railroads had been denied by the Commission, as against the public interest, yet the unification was accomplished through holding companies, and to all intents and purposes the consolidation was as effective as though the Commission had given its approval.

This measure deprives these holding companies of the power to prevent the Commission from carrying out the mandate of the Congress. As the situation now stands, certain railroads can defeat the purpose of the law although the Commission finds its action to be in the public interest. This is the condition that this part of the bill seeks to correct.

It provides that where a holding company acquires a railroad it shall be treated as though it were a common carrier, in that it must obtain approval of the Commission and then be subject as a railroad to make annual reports as prescribed by the Commission; be subject, as other carriers, to uniform system of accounts and other regulations provided in section 20 of the Transportation Act; also subject to paragraphs 2 to 11, inclusive, of section 20a regulating issuance of securities and assumption of liabilities of carriers.

I can see no valid reason why holding companies engaged in the transportation business should be allowed to defeat the will of Congress and not be subject to the same regulation as the carrier.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MILLIGAN. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. Under the set-up of the Interstate Commerce Commission, is there any real competition between railroads?

Mr. MILLIGAN. There is competition of service. That is about the only competition.

The third object of this bill is to strike out section 15a of the Transportation Act and to substitute what is termed a rule of rate making, setting out certain factors which among others the Commission in prescribing just and reasonable rates must take into consideration, and to amend paragraphs f and g of section 19a of the Transportation Act.

Section 15a of the Interstate Commerce Act, as now provided in the law, contains a recapture provision and the rule of rate making. Under this section any carrier receiving for any year a net railroad operating income in excess of 6 percent of the value of the railroad property used in the service of transportation, one half of such excess shall be placed in a reserve fund maintained by the carrier for the purpose of paying dividends, interest on its securities, rent for leased road and the remaining one half is to be paid to the Commission for the purpose of establishing and maintaining a general railroad revolving fund. This fund shall be used in the furtherance of the public interest of railroad transportation for making loans to carriers to meet expense for capital account or to refund maturing securities or for the purchase of transportation facilities, and lease the same to the carriers.

Under this provision the commission has roughly estimated that its inquiries would result in orders to recapture the sum of $360,000,000 from the different carriers. Of this sum only $10,000,000 has been put in final orders and been paid in, the interest amounting to some $3,000,000. The total now held under the recapture provision amounts to $13,000,000. The Commission has not been able to collect the remainder of this sum. Most that has been paid in has been paid under protest. Litigation is now pending in the courts for the balance with no prospects for collection. This provision, which was enacted in 1920, was not recommended by the railroads, the Interstate Commerce Commission, or the shippers. As I understand, it was suggested by one man in the interest of the security holders of the railroad companies, based on the belief it would enhance the value of these holdings by setting up as they believed a guaranty.

In my opinion this provision should have never been placed in the law. It has been a detriment to the railroads and costly to the shippers and the public. A railroad may have one prosperous year and then have several poor years in which it does not pay operating expenses. We know there are fluctuations in railroad traffic. This may be due to floods, droughts, crop failures, or other causes. Many local conditions may affect materially the traffic over a railroad line. One railroad may be strong financially because of the undercapitalization, another road may be week financially because of overcapitalization; but in applying the recapture provision, this is not given consideration because it is based upon the value of the railroad property. You permit a carrier to earn more in 1 year than it is entitled to, and then to recapture the excess above 6 percent to me seems illogical. To me it is axiomatic that you cannot limit the earnings of a railroad property in prosperous times without guaranteeing earnings in bad times. We know this provision in the law has led to wasteful extravagance by railroads in order to avoid recapture. In my opinion the repeal of section 15a should ultimately result in lower freight rates. We know it is impossible at this time to collect this amount, because the railroads of the country are not paying operating expenses. I have in mind one railroad that owes a claim under the recapture of $19,000,000. That road is now in the hands of receivers and is unable to pay State taxes.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER].

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make a general statement without interruption, if I may, after which I will be very glad to yield for any questions that may be asked.

Mr. Chairman, it is my desire to say a few words to the House respecting the condition of one of the Nation's greatest and most necessary industries—that of railroad transportation. The future of this country, and the welfare of its people, demand sound solutions for the difficulties which the railroads face. The situation calls for the fullest cooperation between the Federal and State Governments and their regulative authorities, backed by an informed and constructive public opinion.

In discussing railroad matters, the subject is often approached from the viewpoint of some particular group of citizens out of the many whose interests or problems are involved—the employees, for instance, or the security owners; the railroad managements; the shippers and receivers of freight; the mines, factories, and other industries whose markets depend upon rail transportation and upon the maintenance of rates which will move the traffic; the employees and owners of these mines, mills, and other industries; the consumers of their output; the enterprises which produce railroad supplies and equipment and their employees and owners, and so on. The list is far from complete, but it is long enough to show that a full catalog of those who will be helped or injured by whatever helps or injures the railroads would include the entire population of the country and even involve the security of its industrial and social order.

It is evident also that these various classifications of interests which are affected by the railroad situation are in many cases overlapping; that is, the same individual may be, and often is, concerned in more ways than one. As a single example, thousands of holders of railroad stocks and bonds are also railroad employees or, in only too many cases, they are former employees living in the hope that better days in rail transportation will bring them back to the pay rolls.

Railroad employees today number about 1,000,000. That is, roughly, half as many as there were only a few years ago, yet they are still an army despite the thinning of their ranks. Including families and other dependents, from five to six million citizens of the United States are being directly supported by railroad pay rolls even in these times of unparalleled shrinkage in traffic. In normal periods several million more persons, workers and their dependents, were supported by the pay rolls of the industries which produce fuel, other supplies, and equipment for the railroads.

The present predicament and the future outlook of all these people—the railroad workers and ex-workers and their dependents, and the workers and ex-workers in the railroad supply industries—constitute a national welfare problem to which only the situation and difficulties of the farm population are comparable.

I have the greatest sympathy for the farmer with his mortgage and tax problems and the collapse in the prices of everything that he can produce for sale. Yet I doubt whether the situation of the average distressed farmer is any more disheartening than that of thousands of former railroad employees who are today without jobs or means of support of any kind.

The railroad man without a job has nothing but his savings, if any. He is nearly always a town or city dweller, and if you cut his wages you cut off his entire resources of existence.

What has become of the million or so of railroad workers who, through no fault of their own or of the railroad managements, have lost their places in recent years? Some have found employment of a sort in other work, but practically always at reduced living standards and in only too many cases for pay at or close to the line of bare subsistence. Many thousands have been and are entirely idle who are charges upon relations, friends, or the public.

Of the approximately 1,000,000 still at work, it can only be said that literally thousands live in the daily dread that their turn will come next. How precarious the situation has become for great numbers may be judged from the fact that on some of the largest railroad systems, where seniority agreements are in effect with the employees, it is necessary in many important departments to have more than 30 years' service in order to remain on the pay rolls. Numerous instances have been recorded where, under the strictest interpretation of seniority rights affecting a given group of employees, men with even 40 or more years of service have been laid off because they stood at the bottom of the roster of those who were left.

I mention these matters not because I expect Congress to legislate railroad men back into their jobs, or because I think railroad men have any claim to preferred consideration over other workers who have devoted their lives to other essential industries, but because I think it is essential that Congress and the public in rightful concern over the plight of the farmer should not lose sight of the situation and problems of railroad and railroad-supply workers and their dependents. Their problem should be as much a matter of national concern as that of the farmers.

Let us now turn from the employees of the railroads, to the owners of these great properties, which have been dedicated, and are essential to the public service. Let us consider their stock and bondholders, and who they may be. In theory, a bondholder of a railroad is a kind of secured creditor, one who has advanced capital upon the security of some form of mortgage or pledge. In practice, especially under existing circumstances, the bondholder is really only a preferred class of owner, and we may consider his situation, and that of the stockholder, as one problem.

According to the accepted estimates there are in round figures, 1,000,000 holders of railroad bonds, and 800,000 holders of railroad stock. Those who seek to make political capital out of assailing any and every form of accumulated property, particularly when in corporate form, make a common practice of referring to railroad bond and stock holders as if they were, in large or major part, rich and powerful, individuals well able to look out for themselves. I am sure that even men who for their own ends, try to present such a picture, know that is not an accurate one.

The individual holder of railroad securities certainly has rights which should be properly respected and protected. To do so is one of the functions of government as much as in the case of any other form of rightfully owned property. But in the extent of the interests involved, the holdings of individuals are far overshadowed by the interests of the public as a whole, in the ownership of these securities by great institutions, formed to protect and promote, the public welfare. For instance, life insurance companies and mutual savings banks hold more than $5,000,000,000 in railroad securities, or about a quarter of all outstanding stocks and bonds of all the railroad companies in the United States put together. These securities form an important part of the investments which are the security behind more than 50,000,000 insurance policies and 13,000,000 savings bank deposits.

On the very conservative estimate that at least half of these 50,000,000 insurance policies carry benefits to persons other than the policyholders themselves, we have, through this one source, not less than 75,000,000 of our people whose protection and welfare are directly dependent upon the financial soundness of railroad securities. And who can say how many persons there are whose future welfare is directly or indirectly dependent upon those savings-bank accounts which, in their turn, are in considerable part dependent for their future worth upon railroad investments?

Besides the insurance companies and savings funds, nearly every bank, trust company, hospital, college, school of technical training, religious, charitable, and welfare institution has at least some of its funds, usually a substantial part, invested in the railroads.

The purpose of the bill now before us is to assist the railroads to help themselves, and is essentially experimental.

The mechanics of operation consists of regional coordinating committees, with whom a Federal officer called a "coordinator" will cooperate for a period of not more than 2 years. This coordinator is to divide the roads of the country into three general regions and maintain contacts with the roads of each region through committees of five members of each region. The committees are to be selected by the roads themselves, the right of selection being based on road mileage. Labor organizations are represented on the regional coordinating committees and are safeguarded in their rights of collective bargaining, and all the rights they now have under State and Federal laws are preserved to them.

Another section of the bill extends the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission to the supervision of holding companies and authorizes the Commission to prohibit the voting of securities when such use of them would interfere with the expressed will of the Congress.

Another section of the bill provides for the repeal of the recapture clause of the Interstate Commerce Act, under which the railroads have incurred to the Government an estimated obligation of some $300,000,000, and of which amount about $10,000,000 has already been collected by the Government. The amount already collected would be returned to the roads and further obligations under this provision canceled. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, there are some things provided in this bill which I cannot accept as a general, permanent policy. It is a far-reaching, radical departure in the Federal supervision and operation of railroads. However, this is an emergency measure and may terminate at the end of 1 year. It is a part of President Roosevelt's emergency program.

Now, I have my doubts that either the general public, the railroads, or the employees will receive any material benefit from the provisions of title I of this bill. However, as I said a moment ago, this is a period of national economic crisis. I shall support the bill, and I hope that material benefits will be passed out through the passage of this bill to the general public, the railroad employees, and railroad managements.

Mr. Chairman, when I came into the House this afternoon I did not intend to make any reference to the question which I am now going to present to the House.

I have in my hand a publication printed in Washington. It is known as Labor. I believe it is the official spokesman for several of the railroad labor organizations. In the June 6 issue, in the right-hand column on the front page of this paper, which goes out to probably 90 percent of the railroad employees of this country, you will find these words:

House committee backs President; carriers to fight.

Then, in block it says:

RAIL "LOBBY" BUSY

Having lost in committee, the railroads' lobby is now preparing to carry to the floor of the House its fight against the labor provisions of the President's emergency railroad bill.

Word has gone out to have "company unions" in all sections of the country wire Congressmen that railroad workers do not want "protection." These messages will, of course, be paid for by the carriers which control the "dummy unions."

COOPER (Republican, Ohio) is expected to be the railroads' chief spokesman on the floor of the House. For almost 20 years he has faithfully served "Big Business."

Then, down in the column, it reads:

But not until the friends of the railroads on the committee, under the leadership of COOPER (Republican, Ohio) had made a determined effort to strike out the labor provisions. They seemed particularly anxious to save the "company unions."

I dislike very much to take any exception to that article printed in the paper. There are members of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, which had charge of this bill, present on the floor at this time. During the consideration of our hearings, I challenge any member of the committee, and I also challenge the editor of this newspaper, to point to one thing in the hearings to indicate that Representative COOPER of Ohio ever fought for the company unions or made any statement that I was not going to support the labor provisions as presented by the labor organizations.

For some reason the editor of this paper seems to have a pick against me. He takes great delight in trying to crucify and eliminate from public life every man who does not follow him in his radical, socialistic ideas.

I remember when I first came to Congress in 1915—and I am now serving my nineteenth year in this Congress—I was a member of the same committee with Mr. Keating, the editor of this paper. It was the Committee on Labor of the House. The chairman of that committee was Hon. DAVID J. LEWIS, who is an honored Member of this body at this time. An important measure that was being considered by the committee during that session was known as "the Keating child labor law." Mr. Keating was the author of this bill. I helped put this bill together in committee. I voted to report it out, and when it was taken up on the floor of the House, the first speech I ever made in Congress was in behalf of the Keating child labor law.

Again, in 1916, when there was a threatened strike and tie-up of the railroad transportation systems of this country, at a time when the railroads were blocked and moving more traffic than they had ever moved in the history of our Nation, President Wilson sent for the Chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce of the House, Mr. Adamson, and Mr. Claude Kitchin, Democratic leader, and proposed to them that they pass an emergency bill which was known as "the Adamson 8-hour labor law for railroad workers", in order to avert the strike which was to take place on Saturday night at 12 o'clock.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER] has expired.

Mr. MAPES. I yield the gentleman 5 additional minutes.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. After they had a conference with the President—I was in my office that evening and the telephone rang, and Mr. Claude Kitchin, Democratic floor leader, said to me, "COOPER, will you come over here? We want to see you."

Mr. Adamson's office was in the Capitol where the Rules Committee now is. They laid the proposition before me and stated, "The President wants the railroad 8-hour labor law passed in order to avert that strike. Will you help us?"

I said, "Of course I will." This was on Friday.

The bill was brought up Saturday morning under a special rule, and I stood almost single-handed on the Republican side of the House, as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD will so show, and fought for the first 8-hour railroad labor law that the railroad workers ever had.

Again, when the Transportation Act of 1920 was reported to this House—and Mr. PARKER, who was a member of the committee at that time, will bear me out—there was inserted in that bill an antistrike provision which would prohibit railroad employees going on strike. Judge Webster, of Spokane, Wash., was the author of that provision. He is now a Federal judge. The older Members of this House know how I stood on this floor and fought that antistrike provision, and I think I had something to do with defeating that antistrike provision in the Transportation Act of 1920.

Again, when the present Railroad Labor Act was before our committee I helped put it together. I voted to report it out, and I stood on this floor and advocated its passage.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. PARKER of New York. I wish to correct the gentleman. The gentleman reported the bill out himself.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Well, I was not going to say that.

Again, when the railroad employees wanted an increase of salary for the locomotive boiler inspectors of the Interstate Commerce Commission the representatives of railroad labor organizations came to me and said: "COOPER, you are the man who can get this bill through. Will you introduce it?" I said: "I will." I introduced the bill, it was approved by the committee, reported to the House, it passed this body, I interested myself in its consideration in the Senate, it finally became a law. Yet Mr. Keating publishes on the front page of the labor paper, which goes out to nearly every railroad worker in the country that COOPER is against them and that he is the tool of the big interests.

Let me say to him—and he knows it is the truth—if he will examine the records in the offices of the national representatives of railroad labor organizations he will find that out of 19 measures which they have advocated since I have been in Congress, that COOPER of Ohio is recorded as being favorable to labor on 17 of the 19, and on 1 of the other 2 they say I was 50 percent in favor of labor. Again the record at the American Federation of Labor office, shows my voting as 95 percent in favor of labor.

I regret very much that I had to bring this up, but I could not let that statement go unchallenged.

Why should I not be for labor? I know what it is to make my living by the sweat of my brow. At the age of 13 I went into the steel plants of my home city, in which I have lived all my life. In 1896 I secured a position as fireman on the Pennsylvania Railroad, was promoted to engineer in 1900, and stayed in the locomotive cab until I was elected to Congress in 1914. For more than 33 years now I have paid, and am doing so at the present time, my dues into one of the great labor organizations in the country, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers. [Applause.]

My heart, soul, and sympathy have always gone out to labor. Oh, yes; there may have been times when there developed little differences in policy just like there was in the Howell-Barkley railroad labor bill. There was only one provision of that bill to which I was opposed, and that was the provision which set up Government boards and tribunals to be located here in the city of Washington, the members of which were to be paid large salaries out of the Federal Treasury.

I have a right to be with labor. As long as labor is right, and I think they are right, they are always going to find that I will be their friend in and out of Congress. [Applause.]

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. I yield.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Do I understand that all of the amendments requested by the railroad labor executives have been incorporated in the measure which we are considering now?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. The amendments which are in this bill were those suggested and recommended and advocated by the railroad labor executives.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Did the railroad labor executives offer or suggest any amendments that were not incorporated in this legislation?

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Not that I know of, except the amendments they put in the Senate bill were changed by the House committee with little modification, but not enough to make any material difference, and before the House committee accepted those amendments and placed them in the bill the representatives of all the railroad labor organizations approved them. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MERRITT].

Mr. MERRITT. Mr. Chairman, the bill which we are now considering, like so many bills, has a good many things in it that most of us would approve and some things many of us would not approve.

I shall begin by saying that so far as title I of the bill is concerned, which is the one which seems to be the most controversial, that owing to an amendment, to which I shall refer, I doubt very much whether the bill will produce the benefits some of us hope, or the evils others fear. When you look at the title of the bill you will see it begins thus: "To relieve the existing national emergency in relation to interstate railroad transportation."

Now, what is this emergency? How is it best shown? Why, it is shown by the fact we all know, that many railroads today cannot earn enough to pay their operating expenses and their fixed charges. In other words, they are spending more than they are earning.

This bill in itself does not give the railroads any more power to effect economies than they now have. The Railroad Transportation Act of 1920 authorized certain consolidations throughout the country and set up the machinery with which they could be accomplished. I do not believe this bill adds anything to the 1920 act so far as consolidation goes.

The bill is the result of the difficulties which have come from this depression. It has made everybody appreciate that they must do their utmost to save where they can, to be more efficient, so that at the end they can have a little left of the money which they have taken in in the course of business.

The bill that came to the House committee presumably from the administration was truly a coordinating bill. It set forth the methods of putting into effect the title of the bill. In other words, to relieve the emergency. That bill, as you probably know, starts machinery for its operation by setting up a coordinator, and this coordinator divides the railroads into three sections—eastern, southern, and western. The object of these sections is the same as the function of the States as parts of the Union, to have the different sections of the country through committees consider questions peculiar to the different sections and to suggest where economies could be effected. If they cannot agree, the coordinator is to be called upon in an endeavor to compromise their objections, and he has a certain amount of authority. But I think you should know one other thing also, that the coordinator has no actual power to compel anybody to do anything. This is the fact, and even the things which he recommends and which he orders to be done are all subject to appeal to the Interstate Commerce Commission.

I think the committee ought to understand all these facts, and to understand that the bill, so far as these economies go, was intended merely to facilitate the agreement among the different interests.

Everybody who appeared before the House committee agreed that the present economy would come from combining services and in some cases reducing services. Therefore it reduces services and wages.

This very naturally was what principally interested the labor unions and their representatives, and they had before the committee their very able representative, who objected to this.

Before the House committee had taken any action in the matter, the Senate had injected their labor provisions, which practically froze the employment of today as the minimum, beyond which they were not allowed to go.

I have no animosity whatever toward labor unions or any other unions, but I think the labor unions in this case might, perhaps, have taken a broader view than they did of the questions that involved them. I think it is particularly necessary that this committee should take a broader view and appreciate that when we legislate, we should have the public service and the public good in general before us. I think you gentlemen will all agree that in the conduct of public business and private business that in the end no one is benefited by trying to prevent any business from being conducted in the most efficient and economical way that it can be conducted.

So I say, with reference to this labor provision, if the effect of it, as I believe it is, is practically to nullify the most important economies which can be effected now, or if the effect of the labor provision is to freeze the present labor cost, which is the principal cost, you will not see the railroads recovering and not see them able to reduce their rates or increase their efficiency in the public good as much as if this labor clause were omitted.

I believe that not only the general public but labor itself will be benefited by the efficiency of the railroads. I think if the railroads are permitted to decrease their rates and increase their business it will give such an impetus to the general business of the country that very soon the demands on the railroads will be so great that not only the men who may be let go temporarily will be taken back but many others will be reemployed, and when they are taken back they will then be in the employment of self-supporting concerns and their employment will be on a better basis and will be more secure than if you temporarily try to force the railroads into a prosperity which will soon subside.

I think, therefore, that the labor provision of section 1 is a mistake. I do not think it will redound to the benefit of the public in general or to the members of the labor unions themselves. Let me read to you the section that was originally proposed. This is the section that came to us from the administration, which was stricken out, and which I think should be left in the bill:

> SEC. 7. The coordinator shall provide means whereby such central committees as may be selected by and represent railway labor organizations in each of the groups shall be advised of any contemplated orders requiring changes in service or operation which will affect the interests of the employees, and he shall confer freely with such committees before issuing any such order.

This provision was upon the theory that the committees and the coordinator are human beings and have human sympathies and would look out to the best of their ability for the interests of labor, and it appears to me that this is all that could be expected.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. I should like to interrupt the gentleman there. I would suggest to the gentleman that a lot of us supported the economy bill on that theory.

Mr. MERRITT. That is true.

Mr. MARTIN of Colorado. And it does not appear to be working out that way.

Mr. MERRITT. I think it is verging around in that direction.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MERRITT. Yes.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Does the gentleman from Connecticut believe that it would be good economics to write into this measure provisions which would deprive 150,000 railroad men of their jobs during this period of unemployment, when we are spending $3,300,000,000 of public money to give other unemployed jobs and $500,000,000 for reforestation, having also for its purpose the giving of jobs?

Mr. MERRITT. I think every industry should stand on its own bottom and I do not think that the railroads or any other industry should be compelled to pay out more money than they have.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. Does it not simply resolve itself into whether we shall authorize the railroads of this country to levy a higher tax upon the people in the form of higher rates for freight transportation or whether we shall levy a higher tax upon the people in the form of Federal taxes to accomplish the same result, but in an inferior way?

Mr. MERRITT. I should say in answer to the gentleman that the difficulty about levying a higher tax in the way of higher rates is that you get the same result you get in levying higher income taxes—you do not get as much as you did before.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I think that would be true, especially of levying higher taxes, perhaps, and, therefore, we should defeat our own purpose if we passed legislation here that would deprive 150,000 men of their present jobs in order, presumably, that 150,000 or any other number of men might get other jobs in the erection of public works and in the prosecution of our project of reforestation.

Mr. MERRITT. Of course, the gentleman forgets that, under existing circumstances the public or someone else has got to supply the railroads with the money to pay these 150,000 men, because they cannot pay them out of their receipts.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. But may we not just as well provide the money with which these men are hired in the form of a continuance of present freight rates as to reduce freight rates and dig down into our own pockets for more tax money?

Mr. MERRITT. The gentleman, it seems to me, is resting his statement on a fallacy, because the present freight rates do not produce enough money to pay the men.

If the railroads could do that on a self-supporting basis, the gentleman may be right.

Mr. CHRISTIANSON. I am quite positive that if the capitalization of the railroads was scaled down to a reasonable basis the railroads would earn enough money at the present rates.

Mr. MERRITT. I disagree with the gentleman about that.

Now, on the labor question I want merely to complete the story, which shows where the standard unions were short-sighted, because they provide in the Senate bill particularly that these regional committees should consult only with the representatives of what they call the standard unions.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PARKER of New York. I yield the gentleman 5 minutes more.

Mr. MERRITT. They provide that the regional committees should consult only with the representatives of the standard union. It has been shown here today and in the testimony before the committee that the standard unions contain only slightly more than 50 percent of the employees. The House bill is written in the interest of fairness, so that the standard unions can be represented as well as other unions.

What I am trying to emphasize is not to show up any union, standard or otherwise, but trying to emphasize the solidarity of all employees in times like this.

I sympathize as much as anybody else with the railroad employees, but they first ought to help the railroads into good working order so that they themselves will be more secure in their employment.

My belief is that the diminution of labor will be very slight. Anyway, I hope and believe that all those who may be let out will be soon employed and many more. I hope that all the measures inaugurated by the President will do all that he claims for them. I think if they do the burden of taxation referred to by the gentleman from Minnesota will be easier and more cheerfully borne, and that we can all come together and everybody enjoy abounding prosperity. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY].

Mr. MALONEY of Connecticut. Mr. Chairman and members of the Committee, I was a little bit hesitant about taking any of the limited time to speak on this particular measure until this afternoon, when it became apparent that there might be some attempt made later on to destroy or remove some of the features of this bill. That prompted me to add my humble effort to the effort and able address of the chairman of this committee and the efforts of other members who have spoken on the subject of the bill.

I believe in fairness; I believe in fairness for the railroads, to the railroad employees, and to the members of this committee. So, without much hope that I add anything to these able statements of the gentleman in question, I want to make a contribution toward correcting a false impression.

I have a seat in the committee next to the very able and distinguished gentleman from Ohio, and insofar as I know of the affairs of that committee, I have gathered from my brief association with him that he has always been in favor of the things that labor favored, and particularly insofar as this bill is concerned.

So I hope for his sake, and for the sake of fairness, that no false impression will go out to the country as the result of today's newspaper story, which I am very certain was printed in error rather than with the slightest degree of malice.

I believe as well in fairness for the railroads, because I know, as every Member of this House knows, that the employees of the railroads cannot be successful, and cannot have work for long, unless the railroads themselves are successful. For this reason, I am very hopeful that there will be no attempt to tamper with that part of the bill which arranges for the repeal of the recapture clause. I am in favor of the retention of this feature of the bill, and as a matter of fact the passage of the bill at once, because the railroads are now entitled to this repeal. We have not collected the money. I seriously doubt if we can collect the money. The railroads probably have not got it, if we could legally collect it, and I think that in the first place it was a mistake. Part of the reason why I want to see this money returned is because I think it will not only react to the benefit of railroads, and railroad bondholders and stockholders, but to labor itself, and insofar as I know, labor is concerned with the passage of the bill with this included.

My principal concern at the moment, and the particular reason why I am prompted to talk on the bill just now, is the suggestion made today that there will be some attempt later on this week, tomorrow in fact, to remove from the bill, or to destroy the effectiveness of, those sections which are designed to freeze and protect labor. I am aware this measure has its imperfections, and I know that I made little contribution to the creation or the building up of the bill. If I had my way, I would protect labor differently. I would go all the way. I would save the confusion and misunderstanding, and I would enact some such legislation as was proposed in this body by the able leader and Chairman of the Committee on Labor.

Throughout the hearings on this bill I endeavored to bring out, by brief inquiry, whether or not labor or those other people interested would be concerned with an inclusion in the bill of an amendment which would have provided a governmental regulation of working hours for railroad employees. I thought at that time that before this session of Congress was over we would have enacted laws regulating the hours of labor, and I felt that the railroads should make their contribution to the general welfare and the common good. But it appeared during the hearings of the committee that the railroad employees' representatives, and the others who would and should be concerned, preferred to let that matter take care of itself in other proposed legislation. In view of the fact that that is out, and because the employees themselves declared that they were satisfied with the provisions involving their work, I am very hopeful that no attempt will be made to throw from the ranks of railroad employees more men into the fires of unemployment.

I come from a railroad State, and mine is a railroad district, and I am concerned with the success and welfare of that railroad, as I am with that of other railroads. Incidentally, mine is an insurance State also, and I know about the millions and millions of dollars' worth of bonds held by insurance companies. I know as well of the interest that the stockholders of those companies, and the policyholders as well, have in the welfare of the railroads. But with all of that in mind, I came down here with a full appreciation of the fact that the paramount subject before this Congress and the country was the problem of unemployment. I cannot believe that the Members of this House, in connection with this legislation, are going to add to the troubles and torment of the people by doing anything with this bill, regardless of what imperfections it may have, that will release from employment any of the few men who remain actively on the pay rolls of the railroads. This bill does nothing for labor. The bill does nothing for the employees of the railroads. It freezes the situation at its lowest ebb. In my opinion, we are on the way out, and from now on we will see better times. Why tamper with the last remnants of a group that can help to weld these transportation companies into a better condition and thus point to a brighter day for them?

I do not think I add much to this debate, but I could not let the time go by during which it appeared necessary to say these few words for labor. I do not know how much the bill does for the railroads beyond the repeal of the recapture clause but I do know that that does give them millions upon millions of dollars which the Government has claimed up to now. I do know that it does permit economies under the bill. I do know that after the enactment of the bill—and this is where labor is denied—there can be a curtailment of labor with improved business conditions. So do not think that you are stepping beyond the proper boundary, or any boundary, in behalf of labor when you vote for this bill. You are freezing labor at its lowest point and instead of doing something for them you are only denying anyone a chance to do something against them. I hope when this bill is considered under the 5-minute rule that every man, before he offers an amendment, or votes for one that will change the bill, will give serious thought to the fact that up to now everything that we have done in this Congress has been in the direction of reemployment, and with the prayer and the hope that we would put men back to work.

In what is perhaps the last important bill before the House during this session, the last administration measure—and I understand the President is satisfied with this bill as it is—let us preserve the honesty of our purpose. Let us not go out of here at this late date with one single stain against the honest effort we have made. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. MALONEY] has expired.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. FOCHT].

Mr. FOCHT. Mr. Chairman, it seems to be an open season for violent attacks upon the judiciary as well as upon Members of Congress. I am much surprised to find in the newspaper Labor, printed in Washington, what has been said about the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. COOPER]. I will have something further to say about him later.

I happen to come from a State and a district which is traversed by several of the great railroads of the country, and I have been here when many labor questions were under discussion. As we all recall, the first suggestion of reduced hours of labor was made by General Grant in a message to Congress in 1868. From that time on progressive steps have been taken in the interest of labor. There was almost a tragic scene during one of the sessions of Congress when the Adamson bill was passed. It was at an hour when a general strike was threatened throughout the country unless what was known as "the full crew bill" was enacted, and, of course, the railroads thought it was a bluff. I do not know whether it was or not. The bluff was not called. Consequently, we do not know whether they would have had a general strike or not.

However, in my State we have a situation that is quite different than in most communities. In fact, it seems that everywhere, instead of settling differences between capital and labor today in the old primitive way of getting results with the knife, they do it over the counsel table. I was a member of the State senate in Pennsylvania at the time the Pennsylvania Railroad conducted one of those meetings with their employees. On many occasions we had controversial questions with the railroads, but they were all amicably settled. I think if we would allow the railroaders themselves, with their developed understanding of economic questions, with the high intelligence that you find among the railroad trainmen and engineers and others, to settle their differences, they would be able to handle the matter entirely satisfactory to everybody.

Socrates said, "All men will do right if they know what right is." So, railroaders and officials work out the question of right over the counsel table instead of settling matters by strikes and lockouts, as they once did.

Now, before my time expires, I want to say something about my friend from Ohio, Mr. COOPER. I served 9 years on this floor with my friend COOPER. I have had fine social contact with COOPER. We always thought Keating was for labor, too, but Keating attacks COOPER, and I say he does it unjustly, because I have known COOPER all these years. One thing I knew about him was his consistent support of all labor measures. In fact, he was regarded here as our leader, and many times I have gone to him for counsel in regard to the right thing to do in the adjustment of labor matters. Labor men have always realized that legislation is a compromise. Consequently they have asked for the full measure, never less, and sometimes they have made concessions. But, as I say, I feel, as one who has known COOPER as long as I have, while he needs no defense, yet this paper goes abroad, and as one Member of Congress who has served with him, I want to add my tribute to his service, and I may further say that not only is he an able and capable labor leader and a consistent one but a thorough gentleman besides. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. GRISWOLD].

Mr. GRISWOLD. Mr. Chairman, in the first place, I want to compliment the members of the committee on this legislation. It is not all that I desire. It may not be all that you desire, but some 15 years and more of active connection with the railroads of this country has taught me the vastness of the problems the committee was working with and the almost impossible task that they had.

Whether this law is a good law or a bad law remains to be seen. The only way we can tell whether a law is good or bad is whether it lives and works. If it lives and works, it is good. If this law lives and works, it will be good. We cannot tell until we try it.

I think personally that as far as employees are concerned and as far as employers are concerned, there is only one thing we should be interested in when we deal with the making of laws for the transportation systems of this country, and that is the interest of the public. The employee and employer should only be legislated for in relation to the interest of the general public and as a part of that public.

There are two sections in this bill that cause me to support it, not because of the employer or the employee, but because of the good it may do for the public. One section is subsection (d) of section 7, which provides that in the case of the removal of terminals, the property loss of employees will be taken care of, not because of the benefit it will be to the employee but because of the benefit it will be to thousands of communities throughout this United States. If you will go anywhere through the Central West, where hundreds of terminals have been abolished in the last year, you will see what a tragedy it is to those towns. Men who have put in their time on these railroads for years and invested their life savings in property, are required to move with the terminal, and their property loss is a loss to the community, adding to the already depressed condition of those communities. My regret is that there is not some way to make this law retroactive so that we could go back a year and make good the losses on the terminals that have already been moved.

The other is that section of the bill that rewrites the law in regard to the making of freight and passenger rates. Under the old law we put a premium on the expenditure of money for useless purposes by the railroads. There is no question about that. There is no question that they took into consideration capital expenditures and spent money freely for things they did not need and for which they had no use, for the very purpose of raising freight rates. We have eliminated that. Under this bill freight rates will be based on a fair and reasonable basis, taking into consideration the good of the service to the public, and that is a thing we have never considered; it is a thing we do not consider in the elimination of these terminals today.

The Clover Leaf Railroad eliminated through one section of Indiana four trains that have served that country for years. If freight rates are based on service to the public, maybe we can change some of these conditions.

I do not like some of the provisions in this bill. Personally I do not feel favorable toward the elimination of the recapture clause. I do not feel favorable to a bill that does not provide some method of preventing further borrowings by the railroads of this country.

Three hundred and thirty-five million dollars of the people's money has been borrowed from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation that will never be repaid. The railroads are now in default. Many of them have not even paid the interest on money borrowed from the Interstate Commerce Commission. They have issued billions in bonds and stock that they will never redeem but that under the old law they used as a basis for increasing freight rates. Rates are now so high that the shipper cannot afford to transport his goods by rail.

This bill is far from being the perfect bill. It only eliminates some evils. It is better than we have at present. It is an improvement. Perhaps next session we can improve it more. It is at least a new departure in railroad legislation. It considers to some degree the human element.

I do not like the provision by which we "freeze" railroad labor at the stage of May 1933. Eight hundred thousand railroad men are now unemployed. I fear that many of them will never return to work. But under the law now in force we have no assurance that the list of employees will not be cut even further. This new law would prevent those additional cuts.

I think the proper method would have been to take the average of the number of unemployed over a period of years and to have set the minimum of unemployment at that figure. After all, nearly every act passed at this session has had as its object the returning of men to employment. We should show consideration for returning railroad employees as well as others. But I understand that this section and the fixing of the number for the month of May is a compromise and that it is approved and accepted by the representatives of railroad labor.

I hope that on tomorrow, after the Members of the House have offered their amendments, that this bill will be even better than now. I shall vote for it on final passage, not because it is perfect, but because, from the standpoint of the public and from the human standpoint, it is an improvement over the present law. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. SHOEMAKER].

Mr. SHOEMAKER. Mr. Chairman, this is not the first time the question of the unification of railways has been up for consideration in this body nor will it be the last. The earliest railroad regulation to come before Congress included the problem of dealing with railroad mergers, and unquestionably the last legislation before we ultimately see the wisdom of governmental ownership and operation of the roads will have to do with consolidation of railway facilities.

I desire, therefore, to make clear what I consider to be the fundamental issues involved in this whole question and to place on record the facts which compel me to take the position I hold in reference to the problem.

As I have said, there have been many discussions of this question in Congress, but never before has there been an opportunity for us to see at one time the purpose and the effect of the movement for railroad consolidation brought together by congressional investigation. The newspapers of today are carrying the story of what is perhaps the outstanding movement for railroad consolidation in recent history, and the Seante investigation is showing that that great merger, brought about ostensibly under the leadership of the Van Sweringen brothers, brought millions of dollars of profit to the banking firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. and their favored friends and customers. Before the House and Senate Interstate Commerce Committees representatives of railway labor have revealed in detail, perhaps for the first time in such a way, the fact that railway unification and consolidation have brought unemployment, heavy property losses, and sometimes total destitution to the men whose loyal services have made possible the efficient transportation system so vital to the industries of our country. This contrast shows at once the motive for railway consolidation in previous years, and the terrible effects which have followed the carrying out of the unifications proposed. The great financial houses of the East have merged and unified and consolidated the railway systems with little concern for the communities and the employees injured. To the bankers have gone the profits, and to the people have gone the staggering losses involved in these changes.

It is time that we put a stop to that process. It is time that the Government of the United States intervene in this orgy of banker-dominated reorganizations and protect the rights and the property of the masses of the people affected by such changes.

Only a detailed study of the results of railway unifications can show the misery which they have brought, and potentially may bring, to railway workers and to communities dependent upon railway operations. During the hearings upon this bill, and in their efforts to bring about the amendments which have been added to the bill as now presented, the standard railway labor organizations have earned the gratitude of this body and of the Nation for their clear demonstration of the dangers inherent in the uncontrolled reorganization first proposed.

At the present time the laws regulating the railroads not only permit but they actually encourage railway consolidations. The inadequacy of the existing laws and their unfairness to the railway employees and to the public interest have been clearly shown by the railway labor organizations. Under these laws the Great Northern and Northern Pacific Railway Cos. applied to the Interstate Commerce Commission for permission to merge their properties under a single ownership. In spite of the opposition of State and local authorities, in spite of the opposition of shippers and other railroad companies, and in complete disregard of the interests of the railway employees affected, the Commission approved that merger with but slight reservation relative to the financial connections of the proposed new railway corporation. That was done under the law as it now stands; a consideration of the effects of that proposed merger will show how sadly railway legislation is in need of revision.

The two railway companies asking for that merger represented to the Interstate Commerce Commission that it would result in savings of approximately $10,000,000 per year. Elaborate tables were presented, giving in detail what the companies thought would result. The grand summary of these savings was as follows:

On the surface of it, this would seem to be a very attractive proposal. The railways are to save $10,000,000 per year in operating costs, and while there is no promise that that money is in any way to be returned to shippers, nevertheless it seems desirable to save $10,000,000 if it can be done.

But when these savings are analyzed, as the railway employees have analyzed them, we can see very plainly where the railway companies are going to get that ten million. Four typical items in this long list of savings have been taken apart; the analysis shows that more than 90 percent of the money to be saved is to come from reduced pay roll. By that one unification alone, 4,000 workers would be turned adrift. The corporations controlling the Great Northern and Northern Pacific Railways would profit by $10,000,000 per year, and the employees would lose directly almost the whole of that amount.

In that connection, it is of interest to note that probably the largest stockholder to be affected by the proposed savings is one Arthur Curtis James, whose name has been conspicuous on the lists of favored friends of the House of Morgan, revealed by the Senate investigation. So this great economy move, fostered by legislation passed in this House, and approved in its essentials by the Interstate Commerce Commission, would have taken these millions of dollars from the railway employees of the Northwest and have given them to the stockholders and bondholders of the railways, much of it ultimately to have found its way into the hands of Eastern financial interests.

What was to become of the railway workers thrown onto the streets by this change? Neither the railway companies nor the Interstate Commerce Commission seemed to be greatly concerned about that factor. That was perhaps considered irrelevant. The sufferings of those men and women and their families was as nothing compared with the desirability of adding to the already excessive incomes of the financial giants behind the railway consolidations.

But the concern for the financial elements did not neglect details. I wish to offer here one of the detailed statements presented by the railway companies in support of their petition. The little town of Barnesville, Minn., was a division point on the Great Northern Railway until 1928. The merger plans as contained in the brief submitted by the railroads to the Interstate Commerce Commission called for the abandonment of the railway facilities at Barnesville, and the elimination at that one small town of 60 railway employees. The companies were going to save by the discharge of those men, approximately $100,000; altogether, they were planning to reduce costs by $115,000 per year through abandoning the town of Barnesville. In the list of savings to be made I find prominently mentioned an oil house, which is to be salvaged; a sandhouse, an icehouse, and a car repairer's house. The material to be saved from these houses would have a total value of $145. The railroad attorneys calculated the savings at 6 percent on the salvage value of the material, and that item appears within the total of $10,000,000 the corporations hoped to realize out of the merger. Six percent on the value of those houses is $8.70 per year; but it was not overlooked in the total of savings.

Because of their opposition to the financial condition attached to the Interstate Commerce Commission's order, and because of the vigorous opposition of the people of the Northwest, the railways delayed their merger; it is not yet consummated. But the Great Northern Railway proceeded, nevertheless, with the abandonment of the facilities located at Barnesville. Today, instead of 60 men at Barnesville, there are 2 in the employ of the railway. All of the others have been discharged or transferred. The railway workers, in their statement to the committee, showed the effect upon those railway men and upon the town of Barnesville.

Most of the railway workers at Barnesville had owned their homes. The value of these homes, according to the Barnesville assessor, was $156,411 in 1926. But with the removal of the railway facilities, the workers could no longer use those homes; the town became only a typical small farming community. There was no need for the number of residences that had been built there, and the value of the homes owned by these railway men was practically nothing.

It is impossible to exaggerate the tragedy involved in this change. Railway men of 20, 30, and even greater years' service had been employed at Barnesville. Into their homes had gone practically all of their savings. It was their calculation, and a natural one, that in their old age they would be able to live in those homes, drawing the meager pension to which they would be entitled, and able to keep themselves at least from the streets. A home, by the teachings and preachings of American industrial and political leaders, is a sacred thing; every workman should own his home, and that should be the rock upon which our civilization is built. Many such maxims have been preached to American workers, and many millions of them have bought or built homes in agreement with that philosophy.

But at Barnesville today there is a powerful object lesson in the validity of the idea that the home is sacred to the Government of this Nation. On every street are empty houses which once were the homes of railway workers. Roofs and porches sagging, windows boarded up, yards once trim are now overgrown with weeds. Where are the workers and their families? Scattered throughout the Northwest, those who are still employed possibly trying to begin all over again their painful task of saving enough to buy themselves a home for their old age.

In order to put side by side the treatment accorded to the property of the companies and their employees, I wish to present first the statement introduced by the railroads before the Interstate Commerce Commission, and afterward a list of the homes formerly owned by railway men employed at Barnesville.

[1] The cost of switch-engine service on the Great Northern and Northern Pacific Railways is figured by the managements to be approximately $57.85 per day. For the purpose of this computation they have taken $50 as a round number of this cost. Of the $57.85, $33.57 was direct labor cost and $2 or $3 additional indirect labor cost was incurred. About 9/10 of the switch-engine cost, therefore, is labor cost.

Railway workers paying taxes in Barnesville, Minn., and value of property

[NOTE.—The figures given below were furnished by Mr. R. C. Morben, village assessor. They are for the year 1926, the year when the Great Northern-Pacific merger data were compiled. The tax rate that year was 7.17 mills in Barnesville; the practice was to appraise the property at about 50 percent of its cost and then to levy the tax on 40 percent of the valuation. The basis for taxation was changed somewhat since then, but its effect would be little, if any, on the figures given below]

The reasoning involved in these railway balance sheets which they draw up before deciding upon any coordination or consolidation is simply that if the savings to be expected are greater than the incidental costs and losses the change will be undertaken. And in their calculation of the expected costs and savings they neglect not to enter 6 percent of the value of the material salvaged from the icehouse, the sandhouse, the oilhouse, and the car repairer's house owned by the railway company; but nowhere among their calculations is there any reference to the homes of those railway men—the $156,000 of property taken from these men by the removal of the company from Barnesville.

This is by no means an unusual case. It is only one of thousands which can be found throughout the United States, especially in the Western States. The railways have been proceeding for years in ruthless disregard of the rights and necessities of their employees to make these "savings." Now, for the first time, there is an indication that the Government of the United States is awakening to the injustice done to railway workers, and it must be added that but for the determined efforts of the railway labor unions we would not even now be having an opportunity to curb these grave evils.

The people of the Northwest have been fighting for many years against the unification of the Northern Pacific and Great Northern Railways. It is a matter of the greatest importance to the State I represent. Yet, under the laws as they have existed, the merger is perfectly permissible, and there is every reason to believe that substantial unification of these properties would have been effected in the near future with the same indifference to public and employee interests as has characterized the past conduct of the managements of the railways concerned. Under the new measure, at least, the corporations will be compelled to include among their items of cost attendant upon any unification the same concern for the property of their employees as they have shown heretofore for the sand houses owned by the corporations.

In every industrial city in Minnesota, and I am certain it is true in every city in this country, former railway employees are now receiving aid from public and private charities. Many thousands of the 800,000 let out in the past few years are dependent upon such relief for their existence. But many other thousands are living with railway men still employed, dependent upon those still in the service for their support. In spite of this fact, the railway managements have gone ahead even during these years of depression to make every consolidation and merger they found possible, setting adrift every worker with whom they could possibly dispense. We have the spectacle of these gigantic corporations, affected with the public interest and the beneficiaries in a million ways of public assistance, throwing their employees out on the streets to get a livelihood in any way possible—or to starve. These corporations have passed the burden of caring for their employees on to the other workers in the communities, or to the State and Federal Governments. And for what? To be able to continue their absolutely unjustifiable record of dividend and interest payments, to protect to the utmost the money claims of the security owners whose principal pastime for these many years has been to fatten their bank accounts by fantastic financial legerdemain in the railroad field.

Railway labor organizations have pointed out, and truly, that to increase unemployment now means to pile new burdens upon the community. The man employed today is caring not only for himself but directly and indirectly is providing for the unemployed. Rare indeed is the employed worker today who has not taken into his home some dependent of another worker. And the man who is not directly helping in that way is indirectly contributing, through community funds and through taxation, to take care of the destitute. It is vitally important therefore that we do nothing to increase unemployment, since every new man now put on the streets means not only that one without support but means also that his assistance to the unemployed must stop. We will find our relief problem multiplying as we add to the number out of work.

We have extended assistance by the millions of dollars to railways seeking funds for the payment of interest upon their bonds. At the same time, these railroads have been putting upon the Nation the cost of caring for their workers, the men who must be available when business revives to carry on the work of the roads. The employees presented a table, before the committee, showing just what the railroads have done in the city of Cincinnati. The relief agencies in that city are carrying over 1,000 railway employees. An analysis of part of the records shows them to be former employees of the following corporations:

This act, Mr. Chairman, comes before us as emergency legislation. There is an emergency in the transportation industry, an emergency in all industry. But the situation confronting us is by no means new. It is more critical; it demands immediate and drastic action; but it is not different in its fundamentals from the condition which has existed throughout the last 50 years of our history. Wealth in the saddle, property interests of the powerful dictating governmental and industrial policies, were not the product of the last decade. Even before the Minnesota farmers began their struggle, back in 1876, for railroad regulation, these corporations had begun their march to wealth and power over the wrecks they were making of their employees and of the communities they should have been serving. From the Northwest, in every instance, I am proud to say, has come the first and the most powerful protest against these policies. From the Northwest again, in this struggle to prevent the Great Northern and Northern Pacific unification, has come again the most determined opposition to corporate rapacity in this era of high finance.

The emergency which confronts us is not of today, nor of yesterday, nor will it be ended tomorrow. It is but one episode in the long struggle which goes on unendingly between those possessing the power and the greedy ambition to enrich themselves at the expense of the masses of the people. Today there are 13,000,000 men unemployed. That is our emergency. But it was not made by the stock-market crash of 1929. It was not made by any of the events since that date. Nor is it to be cured by an industrial recovery bill or an emergency transportation act. We, or our successors, will be grappling with this same problem after business activity revives, as our predecessors struggled with it in the prosperous years before 1929. But unless we hold firmly to the principle that the welfare of the masses of the people must be the primary concern of the Government, and unless we reverse the policies which have characterized government by both of the old parties since the Civil War, we shall see again and again a repetition of this acute emergency, we shall see repeated investigations of money trusts, revealing the same sordid story of corruption and of tyranny in Wall Street, and our civilization must give place to one which enthrones rather than enslaves the farm and industrial workers of the Nation.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. LLOYD].

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, in my judgment this is the most constructive piece of legislation that this House has been called upon to enact during this extra session of Congress. It is said—and, I believe, truthfully so—that one half of our cost of living today represents transportation charges, so that railroads and legislation pertaining to railroads becomes a vital matter to all of our people, and particularly is that true of those whom I represent.

I am passing for the moment any discussion regarding the labor features of this bill, and I am doing that because I have it from the words of those who represent labor at the Capital here in Washington that, with three minor exceptions, which may be corrected by amendments offered from the floor tomorrow under the rule, this bill as presented by the committee today is entirely satisfactory to labor and those who represent labor. I am happy that this is so, because in my judgment at a time like this, when we are trying to re-create the purchasing power of our people, it would be poor policy indeed to lay any additional burden upon the back of labor.

I particularly, then, desire to address myself to section 15a. In my opinion, if this bill had nothing else to commend it than this section, which is to be written into the law, it would be worthy of the most profound consideration by this House, and I congratulate the committee which drafted the bill and those who labored with the committee on what I conceive to be a step in the right direction; and if properly administered this section can be used as a vehicle to bring lower freight rates and, in turn thereby, prosperity not only to the railroad men and the railroads themselves but to all of our people.

In my country away out in the Northwest we are vitally interested in transportation, and in cheap transportation, and at the present time, under the rule of fixing rates used by the Interstate Commerce Commission, freight rates are not only too high but they are prohibitive, and the result is that not only is there stagnation in business but the railroads themselves by reason of a short-sighted policy are without business, and the railroad men of this Nation to the number of almost a million are out of employment.

About 3 years ago the lumber industry of this country made a complete survey of its market. The great lumber market of this country lies in the Middle West, in the agricultural States. Those who were engaged in the survey went almost from house to house. They went from village to village and from county to county. They found that over a period of approximately 6 years there had been constructed no buildings wherein lumber was used. They made an estimate of the amount of lumber it would take to bring that great agricultural section up to the pre-war state of repair, and their findings were that that one order of lumber alone would keep the mills of the Northwest running night and day for a period of 5 years at full capacity. Yet the mills are idle today. The railroads are carrying no lumber from the great Northwest to the Middle West; and I will tell you why. Parenthetically, may I say that, in my judgment, had section 15 (a) been enacted into law 15 years ago, the railroads would not have had to borrow money from the United States Government, nor would the insurance companies of the State of the gentleman who just spoke be on the verge and brink of disaster today because they hold railroad bonds.

In this great transportation question there is a vital fact and that is that you cannot charge a rate beyond what the traffic will bear. I could instances almost innumerable, but let me give you the figures in regard to the lumber market alone.

I am told by those familiar with the transportation business that the railroads could haul 3 times the freight they are now hauling and 20 times the passengers they are now hauling at practically the same overhead, yet because we have not a fair freight rate, such as can be made under the provisions of this bill, the result is that the mills of the Northwest are idle, the people of the Middle West are unable to buy because the same lumber which we lay down in our yards at $8 per thousand is taxed a freight tariff from Tacoma, Wash., the lumber producing center, to Des Moines, Iowa, the lumber using center, of $22.44, or nearly three times the original cost of the lumber, and this rate is prohibitive.

I say that if this bill had nothing else to commend it but this section which provides, as should have been provided years ago, that the Commission shall give due consideration among other factors to the effect of rates on the movement of traffic, and to the need in the public interest, it would be well worthy of consideration by this House.

Pass this bill and adopt this as the basis for your rate-making structure and then insist that the Interstate Commerce Commission properly administer the law, get your freight rates down to a half or a third of what they are now, and you will find, in my humble opinion, that the railroads will be carrying not 3 times the freight they are now carrying, but 10 times that amount of freight; the lumber mills of the Northwest will be busy, the mines of the South and East will be operating, the farmers of the Middle West will be able to buy the products which they need at a price they can afford to pay, the laborers in your mills and mines will be earning a wage commensurate with their needs, the railroads will be operating upon a profitable basis at mass production and will be able to pay their debts and give employment to the railroad men who have been trained to railroad work. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. WITHROW].

Mr. WITHROW. Mr. Chairman, these so-called "mergers, consolidations, and diversions of traffic" can have but one effect, and that is to increase further the number of unemployed, thereby curtailing the buying power of the public, which is the real reason for the continuance of the present adverse economic condition of our ccountry.

No one who listened or read the testimony given before the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee of this House can question the assumption that a great many employees will be thrown out of employment by reason of the passage of this measure. At a time when our local, State, and National Governments are spending millions to supply work for the unemployed, we are today considering a proposal which will throw thousands more out of work. The fallacy of the policy embodied in this measure, unless the proper safeguards are placed about it, must be apparent to all of you.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WITHROW. Yes.

Mr. PARKER of New York. How does the gentleman reach the conclusion that thousands of employees will be thrown out of employment under this bill?

Mr. WITHROW. I do not, under the bill as proposed by the committee, but I anticipate that at the time the bill is considered under the 5-minute rule there will be efforts made to strike out some of those recommendations.

Mr. PARKER of New York. I thought the gentleman referred to the provisions of the bill as proposed, and I wondered how he arrived at that conclusion.

Mr. WITHROW. The gentleman from New York being a member of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, very well knows that the bill in its original form, undoubtedly, would have thrown a great many railroad employees out of employment. That is the one thing that everyone who testified before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce seemed to be agreed upon.

Mr. PARKER of New York. But we are not discussing that bill.

Mr. WITHROW. No; but I am discussing that subject because if these amendments were stricken out of the bill, that is exactly what would happen, and, mark my words, I believe an attempt will be made to strike those provisions out of the bill, and I do not want that to happen.

I realize that a reorganization of our national transportation facilities is at hand, but under the guise of a reorganization I am afraid irreparable damage will be done railroad employees and the public in general.

The property and general welfare of entire communities are threatened. The attempt to save several hundred million dollars may result in the loss to the public and railroad employees of several times that amount. The losses of homes to men who have given years of their lives to the service of the Nation's railroads; the losses to entire communities by the impairment of property values through the removal of terminals and the closing of shops with the resulting loss of purchasing power in the community and the further sacrifice of adequate transportation service, not to mention the loss in social values, bid fair to be too great a toll. Unless proper safeguards are placed about the consolidation it is bound to be a failure and prove to be "false economy."

Mr. D. B. Robertson has the following to say:

There is little enthusiasm among the practical railroad men for transforming a compact, efficient, localized railroad into a sprawling, unwieldly "transcontinental" system. An able railroad president or general manager can dominate the policies and operations of a few thousand miles. It is doubtful whether any one man, no matter how able, can oversee the operations of a system of 10,000 miles with maximum efficiency. Inevitably bureaucracy and red tape and internal discord will steadily increase with the size of an organization. Railroading is a human service. It calls for human control. To work smoothly the entire personnel of a railroal must understand and feel a human loyalty to the ultimate human director of the enterprise. Year in, year out, a good, small railroad will be more efficient and more profitable than any equally good, large railroad.

The late Sir. W. M. Ackworth, a noted British authority on railroad transportation and a close student of American railway problems, said:

"In the United States your great systems are already so large that they have probably secured all the economies which are due to large-scale production. Their equipment is standardized, their division points conveniently arranged, their shops established at suitable centers, and the members of their headquarters staffs have each of them as much as they can do."

RAILROAD EMPLOYMENT NOW AT LOW EBB

There are 50 percent less railroad employees now than were normally employed. Most of this reduction has been brought about because of the use of larger engines, larger cars, better roadbeds, modernized plant equipment, and the wholesale impairment of service to the public which has been the real cause of the rapid growth of bus and truck transportation. The public, because they were getting very little service from the railroad companies, were compelled to turn to busses and trucks for that service.

In addition to this 50-percent reduction in railroad personnel by reason of impairment of service and modernizing of plant equipment, which is considered an economy, the railroad employees have taken a voluntary 10-percent reduction in their wages, which has meant a saving to the railroad managements of more than $200,000,000 annually. In addition to this 10-percent voluntary reduction, they have, through liberalizing their contracts with the several railway managements, sacrificed a great deal more. At present those employees holding regular jobs are working fewer hours and miles so that their fellow workers can be kept on the pay rolls. It would be conservative to say that the railroad employee now working has had his income cut at least 40 percent.

Today there are less than 1,000,000 railroad employees, while in 1920 there were more than 2,000,000, and the ratio of the fixed charges and dividends to pay rolls was 24.4 in 1920 whereas it has gone up to 50.8 in 1932. That is conclusive proof that the trouble with the railroads is not due to wages. It is my judgment that any program that fails to take this into consideration will fail. Railroad employees are willing to do their share in helping their country, whether it be in war time or peace time, but to ask them to do more at this time is to do them a grave and irreparable injustice.

This measure, if passed and enacted into law, could very well mean the canceling of more than 1,400 State laws which the several States have enacted into law only after long and deliberate consideration, having in mind the safety of the public as well as that of the employee. State full-crew laws, both freight and passenger, industrial switching laws, safety requirement provisions might be wiped out if the coordinator saw fit, unless the proper amendments are adopted.

RAILROADS CAN BE OPERATED AT A PROFIT

The railroad executives, being shrewd business men, are continually spreading the propaganda that their roads are operating at a loss. When this is questioned they produce volumes of statistics to prove their point. Most conspicuous among this data are the fixed charges of operation, which means the interest on indebtedness which deals with the very "delicate" subject of financing and refinancing the roads which has become so much of a specialty with most railroad executives at the expense of the railroads, the public, and the employee.

Nevertheless, viewing the railroad picture as a whole, we find this to be true: For the year of 1931, which was one of especially great distress among railroads, operating revenues and other incomes amounted to $4,585,000,000; over this same period their taxes, operating expenses, and fixed charges were $4,420,000,000, showing a net profit of $165,000,000, which is far from being poverty-stricken. These figures were presented by the railroads in the National Wage Convention.

However, the President's committee reached all the carriers later, and they stated that the net profits for 1931, after fixed charges were deducted, would amount to only $89,000,000, which, if we accept their own figures, which are certainly conservative, would be $845,000,000 of fixed charges, with a total income of $934,000,000 after taxes. This is substantially 5 percent of $18,000,000,000, which was practically the net capital of the railroads. So in this year 1931, a bad year, they presented a return, after taxes, of 5 percent of the net capital of the railroads, and yet they claimed they were in dire distress.

If they are in distress, that distress exists because the railroads are mortgaged for four fifths of their value and therefore the railroads only have a 20-percent equity. No business can operate through periods of depression under an 80 percent mortgage.

If the railroad managements would concentrate on squeezing the "wind and water" out of their bonds and would increase the service which is so much needed and would fix reasonable fares and rates, the public would be happy; it would stimulate business, put many men back to work, and I am sure would show good earnings on an honest capital set-up.

SAFEGUARDING AMENDMENTS MUST BE ADOPTED TO PROTECT EMPLOYEES

I shall vote against this measure unless the amendments which have been recommended by the committee are approved by this body, for these recommendations would safeguard the public and railroad employees.

The amendments I refer to are: First, the "freezing" of unemployment caused by reason of mergers, consolidations, and diversions of traffic as contained in section 7; second, that the coordinator shall authorize the means for determining the compensation for property losses and expenses imposed upon employees by reason of transfers of work from one terminal to another; third, that provisions shall clearly define that orders of the coordinator shall not annul State laws unless they are interstate in character.

If these safeguards are adopted by this body, the measure has the whole-hearted support of the transportation organizations, and I shall support it. [Applause.]

Mr. KVALE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WITHROW. Yes; I yield.

Mr. KVALE. I was called from the Chamber and I may be asking a question that has already been answered, but in reaching the average and the normal employment which is to gage the employment in the future, has the gentleman stressed the unfairness of taking the figures for May of the present year when the employment and the activities of the railroads are at the lowest point for the entire year?

Mr. WITHROW. In that regard I may say that I believe that of all the months that could have been taken, the one period when the employment on the railroads is at its lowest ebb is during April and May. I think there is no question about this.

Mr. THOM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WITHROW. Yes.

Mr. THOM. Can the gentleman give us some idea about railroad wages, with respect to the three or four classifications and whether or not it depends entirely on the day's work?

Mr. WITHROW. The mileage enters into that question, as well as the number of hours, and I cannot answer the question offhand.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON].

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, railroad transportation is a necessary of life as much as bread. It is a necessary for which there is no real substitute. In the present stage of our civilization and industrial development, without it whole populations would perish.

The interests of railroad labor and of the owners of the railroads, while important, are but secondary; the primary interest is that of the general public. It is quite desirable that the railroads be self-supporting. But since it is an essential and we must have rail transportation, the public interest requires that if it cannot be had in any other way than through public intervention, public subsidy, or even public ownership, then we must resort to that.

We must have rail transportation, and we are going to have it both now and hereafter. This fundamental fact should be faced at the outset.

RAILROADS IN BAD FINANCIAL CONDITION

The railroads are in bad financial condition. The average earnings last year after payment of taxes was only 1.5 percent on appraised value. The railroads as a whole did not earn a penny for their stockholders. Numerous important carriers are not earning the costs of operation. Quite a large number, including some of the most important lines, are not earning fixed charges. Carriers with a total of 182,457 miles are in this category.

It is to meet this situation that Title I of this bill is presented. Its fundamental purpose is to enable the railroads to work economies in operation not primarily in the interest of the owners of the railroads nor of their labor but in the interest of the general public, which requires that so far as possible railroads shall be self-supporting.

SAVINGS AT THE EXPENSE OF LABOR AND SUPPLIES

The only ways by which railroads can economize to a substantial extent are: First, at the expense of railroad labor; and, second, at the expense of the supply interests. Minor savings may be obtained in some instances through the reduction in expense for rentals, but this is so trifling as to be practically negligible. The third great item of expense is taxes, but it is not practical to attempt any savings on that in this bill.

Having in view that savings can be made only from labor and supplies, the deliberate design of this bill is to reduce to the least possible minimum the saving which may be made out of rail labor. It is intended to make possible only such economies as may be produced at the expense of the supply interests. Since also the labor costs of the supply interests are probably 75 percent of their total, this means that of whatever savings are made possible by the bill, small though they may be, 75 percent will come out of the men who in producing supplies work indirectly for the rail industry.

Out of very dollar spent for operating expense, 46 cents goes for labor and 18 cents for supplies. This shows how small is the field for savings under this bill. There is the further fact that any savings whatever must be at the expense of service rendered by the carriers with resulting public injury.

We are exerting ourselves to the utmost to provide work for men to do. We are seeking to start business forward through a vast public construction program. Imagine then with what little enthusiasm I support Title I of this bill.

On the whole it may be well said that the chief value to be found in Title I lies in the provision for the study of the railroad problem to be made by the coordinator—a study which will have its chief value in the future when business is more prosperous and industry is on its feet.

As a relief measure, I cannot escape the conclusion that Title I is just about as near nothing as could be observed under a microscope.

RAILROAD DIFFICULTIES DUE TO LACK OF BUSINESS

The cause of the bad situation of the railroads is lack of business. Carloadings have recently been as low as an index of 49, as compared to 100 in 1926. They now stand at an index of about 55. The railroad owners are making no profits. Those who have loaned money to them find their interests greatly jeopardized. Railroad workers are walking the streets in idleness by the hundred thousands.

The trouble with the railroad industry is lack of business, yet this measure, brought forward for their relief, points out no way by which as much as a conceivable single pound of additional freight will be produced nor a single additional passenger mile afforded.

There are things which could be done to improve the business of the railroads. There are things which would increase carloadings. There are things which would increase the available work for the men engaged in the industry. There are actions which could be taken which would increase business for the carrier, employment for the workers, and at the same time the prosperity of the general public and of the business interests of this country. The amazing thing to me is that in an emergency such as this the gentlemen of the "brain trust" are unable to present any constructive and legitimate plan of railroad relief which would tend to bring about the results which I have pointed out.

OUR TROUBLE IS WITH DISTRIBUTION

May I say here that, from my point of view, the chief factor in the depression lies in the distribution end of our economic life and not in the production end. I believe there is no more fundamental economic error that men may fall into than when they undertake to deal with the depression from the standpoint of production, and particularly may I say through the reduction of production. There never was a more stupendous economic folly than that in this time when men are suffering for the necessaries of life we should find the best talents of our statesmen devoted to devising means by which we may reduce the supply of the things that men need for their well-being.

Our chief difficulty lies with distribution, and one of the main factors in that difficulty is in the trade barriers which have been erected between the consumer and the producer.

These trade barriers are innumerable. They handicap the flow of commerce on both the foreign and the domestic fronts. They not only obstruct the free flow of commerce, but they add to the consumer's cost and cut down his capacity to buy and at the same time take away from the producer that little which he would be able to receive, if only the law of supply and demand were allowed to operate.

A COMMENTARY ON STATESMANSHIP

What a commentary it is upon the intelligence and statesmanship of this hour that during all the three and odd years of the depression not a single measure has been offered from any responsible source which would bring the producer and consumer closer together or eliminate any of the barriers which separate them! To the contrary, we are now busying ourselves with building higher the barriers and making them more insuperable.

The chief of those barriers is the high cost of transportation. Four times within the last 20 years we have had a horizontal increase in freight rates for the benefit of the rail carriers. Four times through an increase in rates have the producers taken from them an additional toll from what little they received for their products and the consumers have added to what they were required to pay for commodities. Four times have the carriers reached out and taken a larger and a larger share.

In practically all instances the present cost of transportation is more than 25 percent more than it was at the time when prices of commodities were substantially the same as they are now. In many instances the increase is 50 percent. In some instances the increases have been as high as 100 percent. We find today that the rail carriers have their rates upon an average index of somewhere from 105 to 110 compared to 1926, and from 150 to 200 compared to 1913. The accurate figure on ton-mile revenue for 1913 is .729 cents, while for 1932 it is 1.04 cents per ton-mile. This is an average and does not show the situation as bad as it really is as to many products and many localities.

Those increases have been made in freight rates, yet we find that the producers, and particularly the producers of heavy commodities such as coal and agricultural products, have their prices on a pre-1913 level, and in many instances even below the 1913 level.

While other prices have gone down, transportation costs have gone up. The farmer, getting an average price index of 45 for his products, is expected to consume transportation on a cost index of 110 in shipping that product.

RAILROAD RATES HIGHER THAN TRAFFIC WILL BEAR

In practically all cases the rates are a serious obstacle to commerce. In many instances the rates are actually higher than the traffic will bear. Not merely is a trade barrier set up, but a trade prohibition. There can be no shipment. I was told this morning of an instance in which the producer of cabbages in a southern State received $65 for a carload of the product of his toil, while the carrier received $225 for transporting that product to a not-distant city.

In many instances the rates are higher than the traffic will bear. In practically all cases the rates are so high that the traffic is retarded, and a large part of it in every line will not bear the rate that it has to pay. Can you wonder carloadings are down to 55? Can you wonder why 850,000 railroad employees are without work? Can you wonder why the farmer and the miner find that a barrier has been erected between them and their customers, a barrier which they find insurmountable?

This bill does not deal with that situation, nor does it attempt to deal with it. It leaves that situation frozen. It leaves it to the tender mercies of the Interstate Commerce Commission, bound as they are by precedent and by law and established practice, and by the necessity of fixing a rate which will yield the railroad a fair return upon investment, a task necessarily hopeless, because the higher the rate the less the railroads can earn.

There was a time when the country stood at the peak of prosperity, when the pressure of business was so great as to force traffic on the rails over the barrier of high rates. There was a time when prices were at a figure that justified the shipper in sending commodities over this barrier. That time has passed. It is no longer here.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] 5 additional minutes.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. The result is there has been a stagnation which stops distribution or so seriously obstructs it as to have become the chief factor of the depression from which we now suffer. There is a remedy for this situation, and that remedy lies in the reduction of railroad rates and charges. [Applause.] Therein lies the salvation not only for the railroads, which can earn more if their charges are less, because they will get more business to do, but for the workers, who will be busy carrying the additional amount of freight that the railroads will get at the lower rates. More than all will the benefit go to business generally. How can we have a resumption of normal business activities when business is throttled at the outset by rates such as are now in effect?

A HORIZONTAL REDUCTION OF RATES

If it were left to me to write this bill, I would throw this title aside, and in its stead I would write a provision which would bring railroad rates down to the present level of the prices of the commodities that move over the railroads. I would give the carriers free opportunity to secure such particular increases as might be found just and reasonable and general increases as the prices of commodities might rise.

I realize the present plight of the railroads, and that some provision would be fair to absorb such of the losses as they might sustain through the reductions, so that I would pay them out of the public funds whatever they might lose by this reduction of rates. I would give them a few hundred millions outright from the Treasury and thereby afford a stimulus to business and encouragement toward recovery.

I would rather give the railroads these few hundred million outright from the Public Treasury in the form of a temporary guaranty against loss from a reduction in rates, which would do so much to lift us out of the quagmire, than to lend them the same amount or more, as we are now doing, thus enabling them to perpetuate their hide-bound policy of charging more than people can pay. They are like a man with a rope coiled around his neck and pulling for dear life at both ends. They are strangling themselves with their excessive charges, and have not judgment enough to slacken up. Let them take the rope of prohibitive rates off their necks.

Let them charge rates that the people can afford to pay and then they will do business. Then the man who is in business can afford to patronize them. That is legitimate. That is constructive. That looks toward a resumption of normal business activity. That looks toward recovery. That looks toward overcoming the depression. Why, oh, why, will not somebody who has a voice that can be heard, advocate such an obvious and patent remedy for the ills of the country? [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HUDDLESTON] has expired.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 5 minutes to the gentleman from Idaho [Mr. WHITE.]

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Chairman, we are living in an era of price fixing, and I would like to point out that the distress which the railroads find themselves in today is the result largely of price fixing.

I may say to you that the largest element of materials used by railroads are the products of the Steel Trust. It has not been so long ago that the price of steel was fixed and raised to a level many percent higher than the original price that the railroads were paying for their rails, their spikes, their car wheels, and even the material that goes into the coaches themselves. We were told not so many years ago that the price of steel rails produced in this country, laid down in England, was $26 a ton, yet under the policy of price fixing the railroads were being charged here $40 a ton.

I would like to point out in connection with this legislation under consideration that the railroads are the victims of price fixing. Another thing I would like to point out as an element of their troubles is the archaic and obsolete method of classifying freight for rate-making purposes. I would like to mention an incident that happened in the State of Idaho when I was on the Federal jury in a case before the Federal court where a shipper offered some farm movables for shipment. In that consignment there were two old buggies. Under the classification one of them was a 1-seated buggy and the other was a 2-seated buggy. They made an arbitrary weight requirement for that shipment, and the rate was so high that the shipper shipped them as junk at the junk rate, amounting to about $40. When they reached destination the agent revised the classification and charged the man the rate under the western classification, so that the freight was $140. He said, "If I have to pay that, you may keep it." They were shipped into the terminal and sold at "on hand" sale, and brought $40. The railroad company brought an action to recover the difference between the price of the sale and the price of the freight, but the jury held in that case that the sale price was evidence that the buggies were junk. That shows some of the difficulties that the railroads are working under with their scheme of classifying freight for assessing shipping charges.

I may say to you that in the town where I reside the agent happened to have an old rate where he applied charges from the eastern terminal to that point, and it became covered up. That rate was made before the war. The other day that became uncovered and he found the new rate was about 100 percent higher than the old rate.

That is one of the things we are contending with today—excessive freight charges.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HILL of Alabama, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that Committee, having had under consideration the bill (S. 1580) to relieve the existing national emergency in relation to interstate railroad transportation, and to amend sections 5, 15a, and 19a of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, had come to no resolution thereon.

APPEARANCES OF PERSONS IN THE EMPLOY OF THE GOVERNMENT BEFORE DEPARTMENTS AS ATTORNEY

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of Senate Joint Resolution 54, limiting the operation of sections 109 and 113 of the Criminal Code.

The Clerk read the Senate joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That nothing in sections 109 and 113 of the Criminal Code (U.S.C., title 18, secs. 198 and 203) or any other act of Congress forbidding any person in the employ of the United States from acting as attorney or agent for another before any department (other than the Department of Agriculture) or branch of the Government, or from receiving pay for so acting, shall be deemed to apply to any counsel or other officer of the Department of Agriculture if designated by the Secretary of Agriculture at the time of appointment as entitled to the benefits of this resolution: Provided, That not more than three such officers shall hold such exemptions at the same time.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I think it is rather questionable practice to bring up matters of this kind after the House has been considering matters in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union all the afternoon.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I may say to the gentleman from Michigan, that I have had this matter up with both the majority and the minority members of the Committee on Agriculture. I may say also that the minority floor leader, with an amendment which I will offer, I understand will have no objection to its consideration.

Mr. MAPES. Has the matter been considered by the Committee on Agriculture?

Mr. JONES. No; it is a very simple matter. It has been talked over with several of the Members. It simply follows the precedent in 2 or 3 other cases permitting the utilization of the services of one man who has had a large part in the drafting of farm-relief legislation without his having to surrender his right to practice law privately.

Mr. MAPES. Under the circumstances, I hope the gentleman will not press his request this evening.

Mr. JONES. Of course, the gentleman can prevent it if he insists, and I shall have to let it go over. The matter has been pending several days, and the Department is anxious to have the measure passed so that the services of Mr. Lee may be arranged for. They will probably be of great assistance in connection with getting the administration of the farm bill to functioning to the best advantage.

Mr. MAPES. I think the gentleman from Texas will admit that it is rather questionable practice.

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, in view of the gentleman's statement, I withdraw my request.

BRIDGE ACROSS ST. LAWRENCE RIVER AT OR NEAR OGDENSBURG, N.Y.

Mr. MILLIGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H.R. 5329) creating the St. Lawrence Bridge Commission, and authorizing said commission and its successors to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the St. Lawrence River at or near Ogdensburg, N.Y., with a Senate amendment, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Page 11, strike out lines 3 to 24, inclusive, and insert:

"The Commission shall consist of 11 persons appointed by the Governor of New York. Such commission shall be a body corporate and politic constituting a public-benefit corporation. Any vacancy occurring in said Commission shall be filled by the Governor. Each member of the Commission and their respective successors shall qualify by giving such bond as may be fixed by the Chief of the Bureau of Public Roads of the Department of Agriculture, conditioned for the faithful performance of all duties required by this act. The Commission shall elect a chairman and a vice chairman from its members, and may establish rules and regulations for the government of its own business. Five members shall constitute a quorum for the transaction of business."

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I may say to the gentleman from Missouri, my colleague on the committee, that personally I think this habit of bringing up important legislation late in the afternoon, when many Members have gone away, is very questionable practice.

I do not know how important this amendment is, but it looks to me as though it might be an important matter.

Mr. MILLIGAN. This is not an important amendment. The original act as passed by the House created a commission and named the individuals who were to be members of that commission. The Senate amended that and authorized the Governor of the State of New York to name the members of the commission.

The minority leader requested that I bring up the amendment because apparently there was some emergency, and they want to carry out the provisions of the bill.

Mr. MAPES. I hate very much to object to the consideration of the bill, but I may say to the gentleman from Missouri that I do not think the fact that a few Members of the House have been consulted about legislation is sufficient, and that we ought to adopt the policy of not bringing up legislation of this kind late in the afternoon. If matters of this kind are going to be brought up by unanimous consent, they, as a rule, ought to be brought up in the morning before the House goes into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union.

Mr. MILLIGAN. I may say to the gentleman from Michigan that I tried to secure recognition this morning to present the matter, but the gentleman from Massachusetts was recognized, and I did not have an opportunity to make the request.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Missouri?

There was no objection.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 2 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to see the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] in the room, one of the conferees on the banking bill.

I am informed the Senate bill contains a provision which would destroy, utterly destroy, the Postal Savings System. The House bill did not contain any such provision.

I do indeed hope the managers on the part of the House will not allow any attempt made by indirection to destroy the Postal Savings System, which could not be done if a bill for that purpose were brought up before this House directly.

An attempt is being made to prevent interest being paid, for example, on the Postal Savings moneys that are deposited by the Postal Savings System in the banks as demand deposits. If the Postal Savings System cannot obtain any interest on those deposits, it, in turn, cannot pay interest on that money to its depositors. This one provision, I may say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, is enough to utterly destroy the whole System.

This bill is controversial. There may be many in this House voting against it because of certain other provisions contained therein; and I will warn the gentlemen of the conference committee that if they leave that provision in the bill there will be a sufficient number of Members in this House favorably disposed to the Postal Savings System to defeat this bill when it comes before the House for final passage.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CELLER. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. Does the gentleman think it would be in the interest of the banks throughout the country to prevent the payment of interest on demand deposits and then allow the Postal Savings to pay interest on time deposits? What does the gentleman think the result would be? Would it not be to drive deposits from commercial banks into the Postal Savings System?

Mr. CELLER. There is no such danger, because money in the banks would not go into the Postal Savings System.

[Here the gavel fell.]

ECONOMIC CONDITIONS

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a radio address made by me recently over the National Broadcasting System.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Idaho?

There was no objection.

Mr. WHITE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by me recently over the radio under the auspices of the Farm Forum:

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience: It is said that "It is a dangerous thing for man to tamper with economic law."

We know that business in this country has met with disaster; that financial ruin entailing immeasurable misery and untold hardship, and hopeless despair, has fallen upon many industrious, thrifty, deserving, and innocent people; that their future has been blighted and their children through the failure of opportunity are condemned to poverty and want.

Yet, never in the history of the world has nature, assisted by the industry and ingenuity of man, poured forth from the fields, from the forests, from the fisheries, and from the mines such a bountiful store for the comfort and sustenance of the human family. Industry and ingenuity have placed at the bid of mankind by the refinements and perfection of manufacture and distribution not only the necessities of a comfortable existence but luxuries unthought of in the times when our forefathers drafted the Constitution and established this Government; and yet in the midst of plenty, millions are in want and stark poverty walks abroad in the land.

My friends, what spell has been worked upon our innocent people? Has man, has our Government, has any selfish group enticed and misguided us into defying economic law?

If I am to explain and give a reason for the sad plight of our people I would say that we have disregarded and defied inexorable economic law.

From time immemorial the nations of the earth conforming to the operation of economic law have based their system of money currencies upon the precious metals, gold and silver, coining both into money at a ratio of value conforming to the ratio of production, thereby maintaining automatic control of the volume of money issued to insure the stability of its value absolutely necessary to the vital and controlling function of money.

From the experiences of the ages we know that in order to have an adequate, just, and workable money system the value of money must be stable and unchanging if governments are to maintain a just and equitable relation between creditors and debtors, which is vitally necessary to the security and stability of the nations' business banking structure. To maintain such a money system the quantity of money must increase in even proportion and keep pace with expanding business and increasing population, which averages 3 percent a year. Turning to statistics we find that the production of precious metals, gold and silver, taken together, fill this requirement, as they increase in volume 3 percent annually paralleling roughly the annual increase in business and population, thus providing a means to meet evenly the need for new coinage. If we should use silver alone, which increases 2 percent annually, we will fail to supply our increasing money need by 1 percent. The use of gold alone has proven with the disastrous demonstration now apparent the futility of the attempt to base our currency system on a single standard of gold which has not and cannot supply the required quantity of new metal to meet the world's growing money need. It is easy to see that the abandonment of one precious metal—silver—produced at the rate of 2 percent, and the adoption of gold alone, produced at the rate of 1 percent, has upset the operation of economic law and drastically contracted the volume of primary money which is the foundation of the credit structure in every land, and that the result has been disaster to business and international trade.

When we look for the cause of the prevailing depression we find it in the debasement of silver—the old expedient of the "clipping of coin" in European countries, when millions of dollars were raised by the European governments by extracting the silver from their coinage and selling the metal on the open market, to be followed by the demonetization of silver in India and Indo-China, which, in effect, created a vacuum in the world's money supply, with a consequent draft upon the gold reserves of the several nations. The money stringency that ensued undermined their credit structure everywhere, with devastating effect upon the buying power of the majority of the people of the human family. The restriction of the ensuing money stringency imposed upon international trade broke down prices and destroyed prosperity throughout the world.

The financial convulsions and ruin that followed the collapse of credit and the flight of confidence are a result of legislation enacted in defiance of economic law.

Let me point out that the demonetization of silver in this country in 1873 was followed by a financial depression so intense in its severity that our Government was forced to resort to many legislative expedients to supply the deficiency thus created in our money supply, first by the purchase of silver bullion by the issuance of Treasury notes under the Bland-Allison Act and later under the operation of the Sherman Purchasing Act which partially met, at the time, the need for new money to flow into the channels of trade. The cessation of this supply of money by the repeal of the purchasing clause of the Sherman Act was followed by a period of financial readjustment with depressing and disastrous results on many classes of our citizens.

It was only when a new source of supply of primary money was opened by the discovery of gold in the Klondike, the perfection of the cyanide process for the extraction of gold from low-grade ores, and the opening of the great Rand gold fields that relief from the prevailing money stringency was had. The supply of new gold flowing from the three sources mentioned in a brief period of time in our day, doubled the world gold stock, in other words, increased it from five and one half billions to $11,000,000,000, at the same time restoring a continuous flow of primary money into the channels of trade at a rate commensurate with the needs of business. This exerted an exhilarating influence on human progress in every line of endeavor. The era of prosperity that followed can be traced and may be credited to the vitalizing influence of this flow of the new money into the channels of business. Later, when the production of gold lagged and the miners were unable to furnish a quantity of new money media required to supply the need of the world's growing business in conformity to economic law, it was then that the needs of business due to natural growth and increasing population outran the flow (supply) of new metal—gold—with a result that a series of financial depressions followed.

It was then that business and legislative leaders, recognizing the effects of this deficiency and the attendant growing money strigency, attempted to devise a substitute for the deficient supply of money necessary to be had under the operation of the automatic system, and after lengthy deliberation and legislative struggle brought forth the Federal Reserve System of banking which set up an agency for issuing money—Federal Reserve notes based in part on gold and in part upon the material wealth of the country as represented in short-time obligations of business secured by acceptable collateral. The authority to issue and contract the volume of money in circulation was placed in the hands of the officers of the Federal Reserve banks under control of a small group of men. How this power to contract the volume of money in circulation has been abused by the authority conferred upon this group is known to the most casual investigator.

Right here it can be said that in contradistinction to the plan of the Federal Reserve Banking System for supplying money to the needs of trade and business by issuing credit money, under the bimetallic system the flow of new money by the coinage of both precious metals is not so controlled nor subject to such contraction, and that the production of new metal would insure a steady and gentle flow of primary money into the channels of trade at a rate that would approximate and anticipate the money need of this growing country.

The function conferred upon the Federal Reserve System of banks of issuing money at best is only a substitute for bimetallism, and in the light of recent experience in this country I have no hesitancy in stating it is a poor substitute.

If we can retrace our steps and undo the mistakes made by past administrations in passing unsound financial legislation in this country—if this Congress can be induced to exercise the power conferred upon it by the Constitution "to coin money and regulate the value thereof", and it will give us a safe, sound, and workable money system adequate to the needs of business by the remonetization of silver and thus return to the sound, safe, and simple automatic system of regulating our money supply to conform to economic law, industry, trade, and business, loosened from the shackles of an inadequate money system, will revive and credit and confidence will be restored to our people.

Let me quote from the words of the immortal Blaine: "The two metals [gold and silver] have existed side by side in harmonious companionship as money ever since intelligent trade was known among men. It is well nigh forty centuries since Abraham weighed to Ephron the silver which he had named in the audience of the sons of Heth—400 shekels of silver—current money with the merchant. Since that time nations have risen and fallen, races have disappeared, dialects and languages have been forgotten, arts have been lost, treasures have perished, continents have been discovered, islands have been sunk in the sea, and through all these ages and through all these changes silver and gold have reigned supreme as the representatives of value—as the media of exchange. The dethronement of each has been attempted in turn, and sometimes the dethronement of both—but always in vain. And we are here today deliberating anew over the problem which comes down to us from Abraham's time, the weight of the silver that shall be current money with the merchant."

My friends, I say in all sincerity that I am convinced if the people of this Nation, regardless of party or politics, could be given the true facts, the naked truth of this money question, stripped of all the misleading statements put out by selfish interests through an indifferent press to confuse the issue and misguide the mind, that they would unite and take such action that Congress and this administration would immediately enact and put into force legislation that will restore silver to its time-honored place in our monetary system.

Let me remind you that from the time our Constitution was adopted and this Government was established that for over 90 years both gold and silver on a standard of bimetallism was the money of this country; that Thomas Jefferson, with money created under this standard, was enabled to purchase the great territory of Louisiana; that we bought Florida; that we bought Alaska; that we added Texas and California to the Union, adding all this territory and laying the foundation for this, the greatest Nation on earth, with money created under the bimetallic standard.

In the years that followed the acquisition of this vast territory this Nation made strides in development that has been unequaled in the history of the world; our shipping and rail transportation was developed from its initial stages. The degree of transportation efficiency attained placed American ships on every sea and American commerce in every port and opened up and gridironed with railroads the vast territory comprised in the Mississippi and Missouri Valleys, where great cities that rival the populous centers of the Old World sprang into being and had their greatest era of development within this period. The completion of the first transcontinental railroad brought to a reality the dream of Columbus and the early navigators, "A short trade route to India." Let me remind you that all this was accomplished and that our business and financial structure was erected under the bimetallic standard of money.

In the efforts of the bankers and financiers of this country to set aside the use of silver as primary money and circumvent the operations of economic law, every expedient, every makeshift, every substitution for the use of silver as money is being tried. For four long years as ruin, idleness, and bankruptcy has engulfed our people we have compromised and temporized with this money issue, faced with the inexorable and incontrovertible fact that the average price of commodities are controlled and are fixed by the price of silver. The price of wheat and cotton, upon which the prosperity of the people of this Nation rests, is ruled by and must continue to be fixed by the price of silver.

Our Government in its effort to restore commodity prices and in disregard to their relation to the price of silver has poured $4,000,000,000 into our depressed markets failing utterly to move prices upward, but deepening the huge Treasury deficit most effectually. By recent legislation we are proposing to pour four billion additional dollars forth in hopes of attaining the desired results—raise commodity prices and restore prosperity.

It is now further proposed in the vain effort to abandon and disregard silver as money to issue fiat money and to reduce the gold content of the dollar, both measures unnecessary and indefensible and fraught with grave consequences and extreme danger to future prosperity and our national welfare.

If we revaluate our gold dollar by reducing the gold content, by that measure we add just so much value to every ounce of gold in the treasuries of Europe and in the ground owned by the British Empire, our competitor and trade rival, producing 70 percent of the world's gold. If we revaluate the gold dollar, every argument of the last 50 years for sound money falls to the ground and we are set adrift on a sea of financial instability and uncertainty with the derangement of our whole financial system and our whole foreign financial relations.

I agree with the most ardent economist that we are on unsafe financial ground and that we must retreat; that we must revise and recast our unworkable monetary system.

Let us go back to the tried and proven plan—to the simple system; the only true, stable, and sound money system yet devised since our Government was established—bimetallism, the coinage of both gold and silver money, retaining the existing ratio under which our current gold and silver dollars were coined—16 to 1, which is conformable to the ratio of the production of the two metals.

If Congress and the present administration can be induced to do this simple thing, our business will automatically be permitted to take control and dominate again the world's commerce and this country will enter upon a lasting era of prosperity.

It is true that our group of international bankers may lose control of the world's banking business, now so strenuously and I may say so disastrously contended for in their struggle to capture and retain the world's banking supremacy; to do this they insist that the monetary unit—the dollar—must be made and maintained in stability and value above the franc and above the pound.

My friends, before we decide to sink this country and our business structure deeper in the slough of depression by continuing this useless struggle, I would remind you that the British group have two incontestible advantages in what for us in the end must prove a hopeless struggle, for a prize—estimated by some economist to be $400,000,000 annual profits accruing from handling other people's money derived from the world's banking business.

Let me remind you that the British Nation by its imperial policy owns and controls India and South Africa. In India it dominates absolutely the finances of 325,000,000 people. In its far-flung Empire it produces 70 percent of the world's gold—new wealth, new money media, flowing in a continuous stream into the British coffers. With this advantage in the hands of our competitors, must we continue an unequal contest and abandon our commanding position in supplying the world's trade?

It is plain that we must choose between world banking and world trade. I am for the restoration of foreign commerce that we may restore prosperity throughout the length and breadth of this land rather than supporting a contest being waged by a small financial group already gorged with wealth beyond the dreams of avarice.

Let us return to the money system of our forefathers, that our dollars may become stabilized and steadied in value and circulate as money rather than be stored as wealth, that in their stability and unchanging value they will insure a just and equitable relation between creditors and debtors, the only means of securing stability and safety for our financial and banking system, that continued security and uninterrupted prosperity may attend the progress of our people in the future.

TAX ON COFFEE

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the President of the Congress of Costa Rica:

SAN JOSE, COSTA RICA, May 18, 1933.

PRESIDENT OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D.C.:

The Congress of Costa Rica in its session of today, and with the knowledge that there has been submitted by the Federal executive power a project which would place a very high tax on the consumption of coffee in the United States, unanimously voted the resolution to address itself to your honorable House, expressing the feeling of unanimous disquietude with which this initiative was received in Costa Rica, which might produce a severe break in the commercial relations of our two countries the importance of which may be appreciated in the fact that 52 percent of our importations concern articles coming from the United States of America, of which I have the honor to inform you.

ARTHUR VOLIA,
President of the Congress.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Florida, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

House Concurrent Resolution 16

Whereas the United States Government has heretofore allocated and expended the necessary moneys to procure an economic survey to determine the feasibility of construction by dredging and with locks and dams an inland waterway on the Chattahoochee River in Georgia at least as far north as Columbus, Ga. (and, if deemed practical, to Atlanta, Ga.); also on the Apalachicola River connecting with channel into St. Andrews Bay, and on west to Choctawhatchee Bay in Florida for a channel 9 feet in depth with 100 feet bottom width, for use of self-propelled barges, and to complete the project as far as it is not already provided for from New Orleans, La., to Columbus, Ga., or beyond to Atlanta, said inland waterway being already provided for and nearing completion from New Orleans to Pensacola, Fla.; and

Whereas a very reliable economic survey was made for the Waterway Committee of Columbus, Ga., by former Chief of United States Army Engineers William M. Black and his associates, Charles A. McKenney and John Stewart, and a very complete and exhaustive report made by them and delivered to United States Army Board of Engineers, showing in detail that the contemplated improvement to canalize the Chattahoochee and Apalachicola River system would result in a net saving of the sum of $647,371.73 per annum; and

Whereas said report was made about May 1, 1929, at which time small trees in that section were considered practically worthless and given little consideration, as the paper-making industry had not yet started in that locality, but is now being carried on on St. Andrews Bay at Bay Harbor, Fla., and using 180,000 cords of paper wood a year, one third of which is brought through canal from Apalachicola River into St. Andrews Bay on barges; and

Whereas on May 2, 1933, a hearing was had at Columbus, Ga., before the United States Army Board of Engineers on this river project and much data presented to further increase and add to the amount of annual net saving shown in the very valuable report of Black, McKenney & Stewart, and to the extent to show an annual net benefit exceeding a million dollars; and

Whereas it is shown in the report mentioned and at said hearing that the construction and use of this waterway would give a vast amount of employment and increasing and permanent benefits, including among other things, millions of dollars to be paid to many farmers and landowners for wood, for employment cutting it, for hauling it to barges, for barging it down to tidewater where it can be profitably used by reason of ocean rates for shipment to its destination, after being manufactured into paper or paper products, at or near Panama City, Fla.; and

Whereas it is conservatively estimated that on 6,000,000 acres of land in easy trucking distance of river there is an average of 3 cords, or 18,000,000 cords, weighing 50,000,000 tons, and sufficient for operation of a paper mill such as the Southern Kraft Paper Mill at Bay Harbor, now using 180,000 cords a year, for 100 years. Furthermore the annual growth of the small pine on account of reforestation would be at least 450,000 cords, or 1,260,000 tons; and

Whereas it is believed that this project should soon be reported to the public works committee now arranging the public-works program for President Roosevelt, and that this system of waterways is one of the most worthy projects in the United States: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Florida (the senate concurring), That the public works committee of President Roosevelt, the Federal Bureau of Public Works, our Senators and Congressmen in Washington, and President Roosevelt are hereby urged and requested to use every effort at their command to allocate funds to and for the immediate construction of canal suitable for the operation of self-propelled barges for the completion of the inland waterway from New Orleans, La., to Columbus, Ga., or beyond to Atlanta, as the case may be; be it further

Resolved, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded by the secretary of the State of Florida under the great seal of the State of Florida in due form to the Congress of the United States and the several Members thereof from Florida, and to President Roosevelt.

Approved by the Governor of Florida, May 27, 1933.

STATE OF FLORIDA,
Office Secretary of State, ss:

I, R. A. Gray, secretary of state of the State of Florida, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of House Concurrent Resolution No. 16 as passed by the Legislature of Florida, session 1933, and filed in this office.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State of Florida, at Tallahassee, the capital, this the 1st day of June A.D. 1933.

[SEAL] R. A. GRAY,
Secretary of State.

The VICE PRESIDENT also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by citizens of Czechoslovak descent, assembled in Pilsen Park, Chicago, Ill., favoring the prompt passage of legislation known as the "unemployed and insurance bill", which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram from the North End Federated Clubs of Seattle, Wash., by Mrs. Ethel Verner, secretary, favoring the adoption by Congress of a proposed income-tax measure and the defeat of the manufacturers' sales tax proposal, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a telegram from the convention of the Association of Manufacturers of Wood Working Machinery, Chicago, Ill., protesting against the labor clause in Senate bill 1712, the so-called "industrial control and public works bill", and stating that such clause "will result in strikes and lockouts and retard rather than promote reemployment of labor", etc., which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the League of War Veteran Guardsmen, national headquarters, East Lynn, Mass., favoring direct credits for everybody, and stating in part that "the people of the great common and middle classes all turn your eyes and lend your help to the coming 'new emancipator' in the Direct Credits Society, 606 Woodward Avenue, Detroit, Mich.", etc., which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution of the Committee on Internal Trade of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, recommending that certain language in the so-called "industrial control bill" in reference to "collective bargaining" be stricken out and the bill amended by inserting other language, because of present ambiguity and unforeseen potentialities, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, commending action by the Government to provide special taxation to take care of the interest and sinking fund on bonds issued for expenditures authorized by the national industrial recovery bill, and stating "that the chamber of commerce opposes the application of normal income-tax rates to incomes from corporation dividends for the above purpose, but recommends that the additional revenue necessary to meet the expenditures be raised by the enactment of a sales tax", which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Thirteenth Annual Convention of the American Association for the Recognition of the Irish Republic, New York City, N.Y., condemning alleged economic warfare against the Irish people by Great Britain "as inhuman, un-Christian, and repulsive to the American spirit of liberty and fair play", and requesting the Government of the United States, if necessary, to assist the people of Ireland in defending themselves against such treatment by preferential trade relations and tariffs, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a memorial from Ernest J. Lessing, of New Orleans, La., endorsing Hon. HUEY P. LONG, a Senator from the State of Louisiana, condemning attacks made upon him, and remonstrating against a senatorial investigation relative to his alleged acts and conduct, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by citizens of Czechoslovak descent, assembled in Pilsen Park, Chicago, Ill., favoring the passage of legislation providing for a 6-hour day and 5-day working week, without lowering the weekly wages, and opposing the employment of children under 16 years of age in industry or women in night work, which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. KEYES presented resolutions adopted by the directors of the Railway Employees' and Citizens' Association of New Hampshire, of Concord, N.H., opposing the making of further appropriation for the construction, etc., of the Great Lakes-St. Lawrence deep waterway, which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. FLETCHER presented the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of the State of Florida, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce:

(Senate committee substitute for House Concurrent Resolution 11)

Joint memorial of the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Florida to the President of the United States requesting the assistance and cooperation of every available Federal agency in order to make possible, at an early date, commencement of construction work on a ship canal across the peninsula of the State of Florida

Whereas the construction of a ship canal across the State of Florida will give employment to a vast amount of human labor, thus greatly relieving the distress due to the unemployment crisis, at the same time creating a valuable commercial and military asset which will in the course of time repay its own cost through the collection of reasonable tolls from ships using the canal; and

Whereas the Constitution of the State of Florida contemplates with favor the construction of such a canal across the State and makes provision for and authorizes special legislation in order to facilitate such construction, and the legislature of the State has now created a public corporation known as the "Florida Ship Canal Authority" and has granted to said corporation a franchise with full power and authority to construct said canal; and

Whereas such a canal will cut off approximately 500 miles of distance by the water route between New Orleans and the Gulf ports, on the one hand, and New York and Liverpool, on the other, will eliminate the danger to shipping incident to passage through the Florida Straits, will bring about tremendous savings by reason of the resultant reduction in time, insurance, and other transportation costs, and will constitute a valuable asset to our national defense; and

Whereas such a canal will largely solve the distribution problems of the Mississippi Valley and of the southeast section of the United States, will greatly aid the agricultural and industrial activities in said section by furnishing them perpetual and cheap transportation to the Atlantic seaboard where the best markets are located, will enhance the value of the farm lands through the producing of means for delivering their produce to market, and will offer material advantages and benefits to fully one half of the producing area of the United States; and

Whereas said ship canal, while rendering this valuable service to labor, industry, agriculture, and ocean shipping, will at the same time, and without additional cost, provide a connection between the Atlantic coastal waterway and the Gulf coastal waterway for barges and small craft plying between Boston, Mass., and Gulf of Mexico ports; and

Whereas the Corps of Engineers of the Army of the United States, pursuant to authorization of Congress, is now completing an exhaustive physical survey of various possible routes for such a canal and of the costs of the construction thereof; and

Whereas an application is now pending with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of the United States for a loan of sufficient funds with which to construct said canal, such loan to be self-liquidating in character: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate of the State of Florida (the house of representatives concurring), That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, respectfully urged to approve of said construction project as an effective measure in relieving unemployment and stimulating industry, and that he be, and he is hereby, further requested to procure the assistance and cooperation of every appropriate and available Federal agency in order that construction work upon said project may be commenced at the earliest possible date; be it further

Resolved, That the secretary of state be directed to furnish a certified copy of this memorial to the President of the United States, to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation of the United States, and to the Associated Press.

Approved by the Governor of Florida May 27, 1933.

STATE OF FLORIDA,
Office Secretary of State, ss:

I, R. A. Gray, secretary of state of the State of Florida, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of senate committee substitute for House Concurrent Resolution No. 11, as passed by the Legislature of Florida, session 1933, and filed in this office.

Given under my hand and the great seal of the State of Florida, at Tallahassee, the capital, this the 30th day of May A.D. 1933.

[SEAL] R. A. GRAY,
Secretary of State.

REMONETIZATION OF SILVER

Mr. WHEELER presented a letter from Harry G. Beatty, Esq., of Buffalo, Wyo., with an enclosed resolution or petition praying for the passage of legislation for the remonetization of silver, which, with the accompanying petition, was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD without the signatures of the petitioners, as follows:

BUFFALO, WYO., May 29, 1933.

Hon. BURTON K. WHEELER,
United States Senate, Washington, D.C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Enclosed herewith please find a copy of a petition signed by 179 citizens of Johnson County, Wyo., praying that permanent legislation be enacted for the remonetization of silver, the original of which has been forwarded to Senator KENDRICK.

Senator, the people of these United States are behind you in this movement 100 percent—those opposed, of course, are a few bankers. Keep up the good work. If it is not already too late to save the great mass of our people, Congress should do first and above all two things: Remonetize silver; pay the soldiers' bonus immediately in full with new money.

Trusting your administration will fulfill its promises and continue its efforts to save the common people, with all good wishes, I am

Yours truly,

HARRY G. BEATTY.

Resolution

Whereas there is a world-wide depression causing suffering to millions of people throughout the world, and particularly in the United States; and

Whereas this depression is a money panic caused by the breakdown of the monetary systems of the world and demonstrating the need of sufficient money to properly transact the world's business and thus proving beyond doubt the utter failure of the single gold standard; and

Whereas such conditions have caused the fall of commodity prices, the increase of unemployment, and the limitation of earning power of the great mass of our people; and

Whereas the common people of these United States demand a sound and adequate money based upon and secured by both gold and silver, which has in the past for more than a thousand years served the world as a satisfactory medium of exchange; and

Whereas the people of the United States are extremely tired of experimentations when a sound, sane, tried, and proven monetary system is available and can be quickly reestablished by again making silver a money; and

Whereas the only feasible plan offered the people of the world to date to assist in bringing back normal times and prosperity is the remonetization of silver: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the undersigned citizens and residents of Johnson County, Wyo., do hereby respectfully urge and demand the immediate passage by Congress of what is commonly known as the "Wheeler bill", Senate bill No. 70, for the remonetization of silver, regardless of what action, if any, the Economic Conference may later take at the meeting in June 1933; be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States; the Honorable JOHN B. KENDRICK and the Honorable ROBERT D. CAREY, Senators; and the Honorable VINCENT CARTER, Representative from the State of Wyoming; and the Honorable BURTON K. WHEELER, Senator from the State of Montana.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

PUBLICATIONS OF AMERICAN HISTORICAL ASSOCIATION

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, on yesterday I had intended to offer an amendment to the appropriation bill until I learned that the amendment had not recently been estimated for by the Budget Bureau, although it had been estimated for in connection with the similar bill which was passed at the last session. For that reason I did not offer the amendment, and the session of the Senate was so crowded that I did not even have an opportunity to state why I wanted the Senate to consider the amendment. So, for the sake of the record, and in order that later on we may consider the amendment when it may be in order, I should like to say that the American Historical Association, which was created back in 1884, and in 1889 began publishing its annual reports. Those reports up to date number 72 volumes. They contain most valuable information of a historical character. The Government assumes the authority, in the appropriation bills in connection with items for the Smithsonian Institution, to print these reports. From 1907 until 1930 the annual appropriation was $7,000 for that purpose. In 1930 it was increased to $12,000, last year it was reduced under the stress of economy to $8,000, and this year it was entirely omitted. I made some inquiry as to why such a very important item should be omitted, and it was stated that the omission was temporary, but it was hoped that later on the appropriation might be reinstated.

For the information of Senators who may not have looked into the activities of this organization, let me state that its first president was the famous Andrew D. White, later on president of Cornell University, and a famous diplomat. Among its presidents were such men as George Bancroft, James P. Angell, James Ford Rhodes, Theodore Roosevelt, Woodrow Wilson, Admiral Mahan, and other men of the very highest type in historical study.

Among the very valuable contributions that the Government has printed the one that I think is probably as valuable as any was the autobiography, including a lot of correspondence, of Martin Van Buren. We usually regard Van Buren as a mere politician, but anyone who would take the time to read the correspondence of that famous New York citizen would have, I am sure, a revised view of who Martin Van Buren was in his day. The correspondence of such men as John C. Calhoun, which never would have come to light if it had not been for this movement, and the correspondence of Alexander H. Stephens and men of that type is reclaimed from such sources and these valuable historic contributions are made a matter of permanent record.

I sincerely hope that in the stress of economy we will not permit this very remarkable work to be discontinued. As I said, it has never been interrupted until this year. I am told that it was only interrupted because of the stress of conditions and that it may be renewed. The diplomatic correspondence that is waiting now for publication, including the new bibliography on history and the annual report of the association, which are governmental largely, ought not to be lost to us.

Mr. President, I wanted to make this statement in order that in the future we might have consideration of the matter. I ask unanimous consent that I may have inserted in the RECORD at this point a memorandum of the activities of the association.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The memorandum is as follows:

MEMORANDUM ON PRINTING APPROPRIATION FOR THE AMERICAN HISTORICAL ASSOCIATION

For many years the independent offices appropriation bill has carried, as an item under the appropriations for the Smithsonian Institution's printing, an item for the printing of the annual report of the American Historical Association. This item, which stood at $7,000 from 1907 to 1930, was made $12,000 in the appropriations for 1931 and 1932, and $8,000 in those for tne present fiscal year. In the estimates for the new bill, for 1934, all such appropriation is omitted. I am sure that the association appreciates the reasons why there should be a reduction, but it is surely not necessary to go so far as to omit the appropriation entirely. While the Government has always done a great deal for science, this small appropriation (or credit at the Government Printing Office) is one of the very few things the Government has been doing for history.

The American Historical Association was founded in 1884 and chartered by act of Congress in 1889. Among its presidents have been such men as Andrew D. White, George Bancroft, William Wirt Henry, James B. Angell, Henry Adams, Senator George F. Hoar, James Ford Rhodes, Charles Francis Adams, Admiral A. T. Mahan, John B. McMaster, Theodore Roosevelt, and Woodrow Wilson. The association has always been managed by a council composed of leading historians. All its work is of high quality, and its volumes have been prepared as a labor of love without the Government having been called upon to expend a dollar for their preparation.

The act of incorporation requires the association to "report annually to the secretary of the Smithsonian Institution concerning its proceedings and the condition of historical study in America", with provision that the "said secretary shall communicate to Congress the whole of such report, or such portions thereof as he shall see fit." Under this provision the association has printed a splendid series of volumes, 2 a year ordinarily, 72 in all, containing its proceedings, reports of its various committees, and a wealth of documentary material for American history—such volumes as the Correspondence of John C. Calhoun, of the earlier French Ministers to the United States, of James A. Bayard, a negotiator of the Treaty of Ghent, of Alexander H. Stephens and Robert Toombs, the autobiography of Martin Van Buren, the diplomatic correspondence of the Republic of Texas, the papers of Stephen F. Austin, and the diary of Edward Bates, Lincoln's Attorney General—a series of which the Government may well be proud. Each year they also publish a bibliography of all the previous year's writings on American history or any part of it, a manual very useful to all scholars. And they now have ready for publication an important Guide to the Study of American Diplomatic History, detailing all the writings and sources in which the student can find information on that very important subject. All these volumes, it should be emphasized, are prepared without any cost to the Government, though foreign governments expend large sums of public money for just such work of compilations and editing. All the Government has been called upon to do is to print the results, as books of reference for the historical scholars of the country and all who are interested in the history of the Nation.

It seems a great pity that this important series should lapse, even for 1 year, that there should be a blank in the series of annual reports, that the annual bibliography for 1932 should be missing, or that the Guide to American Diplomatic History, all ready for publication, should be held up indefinitely. If it is thought impracticable to continue the full appropriation of $8,000 for 1934, an appropriation of 25 percent less, that is, of $6,000, would enable the association to continue its useful work of enlightening our past and encouraging and facilitating its study.

THE GOLD STANDARD

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask the Senate now to proceed with the unfinished business. I ask that the joint resolution may be read.

The Senate resumed consideration of the joint resolution (H.J.Res. 192) to assure uniform value to the coins and currencies of the United States, which was read, as follows:

Whereas the holding of or dealing in gold affect the public interest, and are, therefore, subject to proper regulation and restriction; and

Whereas the existing emergency has disclosed that provisions of obligations which purport to give the obligee a right to require payment in gold or a particular kind of coin or currency of the United States, or in an amount in money of the United States measured thereby, obstruct the power of the Congress to regulate the value of the money of the United States, and are inconsistent with the declared policy of the Congress to maintain at all times the equal power of every dollar, coined or issued by the United States, in the markets and in the payment of debts. Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, etc., That (a) every provision contained in or made with respect to any obligation which purports to give the obligee a right to require payment in gold or a particular kind of coin or currency, or in an amount in money of the United States measured thereby, is declared to be against public policy; and no such provision shall be contained in or made with respect to any obligation hereafter incurred. Every obligation, heretofore or hereafter incurred, whether or not any such provision is contained therein or made with respect thereto, shall be discharged upon payment, dollar for dollar, in any coin or currency which at the time of payment is legal tender for public and private debts. Any such provision contained in any law authorizing obligations to be issued by or under authority of the United States, is hereby repealed, but the repeal of any such provision shall not invalidate any other provision or authority contained in such law.

(b) As used in this resolution, the term "obligation" means an obligation (including every obligation of and to the United States, excepting currency) payable in money of the United States; and the term "coin or currency" means coin or currency of the United States, including Federal Reserve notes and circulating notes of Federal Reserve banks and national banking associations.

SEC. 2. The last sentence of paragraph (1) of subsection (b) of section 43 of the act entitled "An act to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power, to raise revenue for extraordinary expenses incurred by reason of such emergency, to provide emergency relief with respect to agricultural indebtedness, to provide for the orderly liquidation of joint-stock land banks, and for other purposes", approved May 12, 1933, is amended to read as follows:

"All coins and currencies of the United States (including Federal Reserve notes and circulating notes of Federal Reserve banks and national banking associations) heretofore or hereafter coined or issued, shall be legal tender for all debts, public and private, public charges, taxes, duties, and dues, except that gold coins, when below the standard weight and limit of tolerance provided by law for the single piece, shall be legal tender only at valuation in proportion to their actual weight."

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I will state that it is important to have as early action as possible on the joint resolution. We have to enter upon a plan of financing that is pressing, and the Treasury and the President feel that the joint resolution is absolutely necessary to enable them to proceed with their financing plans.

We have taken up for consideration the House joint resolution because it has passed the House, and in order to speed the matter. A similar joint resolution was introduced in the Senate, referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, and reported back favorably without amendment. We can postpone the Senate measure indefinitely when and if we pass the House measure. This would complete the legislation and, therefore, we are proceeding to consider the House joint resolution. It passed the House and is here now for our consideration. As I said, it is necessary to get as early action as possible because under the plans of the Treasury Department it is required that within a few days notices shall be sent out as to the methods they will pursue with reference to financing the affairs of the Government.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Was there a proposal in the committee to limit this proposition to new loans and not to apply it to existing contracts?

Mr. FLETCHER. There was.

Mr. VANDENBERG. What was the vote in the committee on that subject?

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not remember the vote. The proposal was defeated.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Was it defeated by a narrow margin?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think perhaps it might be called a narrow margin. My recollection is there was a majority of 3 or 4.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Has the Senator available the form in which that amendment was offered in the committee?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; I have not. Of course, if that sort of amendment were adopted, it would destroy the whole plan.

Mr. VANDENBERG. But it would not destroy the credit of the Government.

Mr. FLETCHER. No; and it will not be destroyed anyhow.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. I assume the Senator is going to discuss somewhat in detail the provisions of the joint resolution, but I desire to hear, if it is possible to do so, exactly why, under lines 9 and 10, page 2, "every obligation heretofore or hereafter incurred", the joint resolution is made retroactive in respect to obligations that have been heretofore executed, obligations, as I understand it, relating not only to private transactions but to governmental obligations within which there is a distinct covenant. Will the Senator state the reason why it is deemed necessary to have this made retroactive?

Mr. FLETCHER. I would have come to that in a moment or two, but I do not object to stating it now. The situation cannot be met merely by enabling new obligations to be payable in legal tender without creating a difference in value between the old and the new obligations and impairing or destroying the market for new obligations. Investors would no doubt prefer private obligations with a gold clause to Government obligations payable in currency. In other words, we cannot make a distinction. The moment bonds or certificates or notes are offered to the public payable in legal tender, with outstanding obligations of the Government payable in gold, it will be seen that investors would rush to the gold obligations and call for that sort of security and would not take the new certificates or the new debentures or the new bonds or the new obligations. It will interfere both with financing of the Government and financing of private enterprise. We would pass two different kinds of currency if we were to attempt that.

I will take up the joint resolution in its sequence. The first section provides:

That every provision contained in or made with respect to any obligation which purports to give the obligee a right to require payment in gold or a particular kind of coin or currency, or in an amount in money of the United States measured thereby, is declared to be against the public policy.

There is no question that we have the right and the authority to do that under the Constitution. That is the first provision of the joint resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON and Mr. FESS addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. FLETCHER. I will yield first to the Senator from California.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator said, and I think he is correct, that under the Constitution we have the right doubtless to change the currency as we desire. I presume that submitted to the committee were briefs upon the subject and the legal question, were there not?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does the committee stand upon the English decisions that have been rendered in that regard?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; we do not. We have a brief on the subject, submitted by the Treasury.

Mr. JOHNSON. I trust the Senator will not think I am pertinacious in these inquiries. If there is a report on the subject that deals with the very important questions involved, I shall be content to go through that report. Was there a report rendered upon this matter?

Mr. FLETCHER. A report was rendered by the Senate committee and also by the House committee. In addition to that I have here a statement submitted by the Treasury which I shall be glad to have the Senator examine.

Mr. JOHNSON. I thank the Senator very much. I do not want unduly to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. FLETCHER. That covers the whole ground, and I shall be glad to have the Senator read it.

The first proposal in the joint resolution is that it is against public policy to make obligations payable in gold, and the measure then proceeds:

And no such provision shall be contained in or made with respect to any obligations hereafter incurred. Every obligation, heretofore or hereafter incurred, whether or not any such provision is contained therein or made with respect thereto, shall be discharged upon payment, dollar for dollar, in any coin or currency which at the time of payment is legal tender for public and private debts.

In other words, we are going to have only one currency, a currency issued in pursuance of the joint resolution and payable dollar for dollar. We have not interfered with the laws with reference to keeping at parity with gold the money of the United States. There is no repeal of any of those statutes. We are proposing to issue legal-tender obligations which will take the place of those obligations payable in gold. We are not depriving anybody of any property or of any value or of any rights they now have, except that we are not proposing to pay in gold absolutely the obligations, but we are giving what is equal to gold, what is as good as gold, and no one can claim that he has lost anything by this kind of transfer.

Any such provision contained in any law authorizing obligations to be issued by or under authority of the United States is hereby repealed.

Then in paragraph (b) it is stated:

As used in this resolution, the term "obligation" means an obligation (including every obligation of and to the United States, excepting currency) payable in money of the United States—

There can be nothing better than that.

> And the term "coin or currency" means coin or currency of the United States, including Federal Reserve notes and circulating notes of Federal Reserve banks and national banking associations.

Section 2 amends the act which was passed recently, entitled "An act to relieve the existing national economic emergency by increasing agricultural purchasing power", and so forth, approved May 12, 1933. That act, at page 23 of the public print, contains the following clause, which is amended by the pending measure:

> Such notes, and all other coins and currency heretofore or hereafter coined or issued by or under the authority of the United States, shall be legal tender for all debts, public and private.

That is the language of the present act. We amend that by clarifying and enlarging the scope somewhat to read as follows:

> All coins and currencies of the United States (including Federal Reserve notes and circulating notes of Federal Reserve banks and national banking associations) heretofore or hereafter coined or issued shall be legal tender for all debts, public and private, public charges, taxes, duties, and dues, except that gold coins, when below the standard weight and limit of tolerance provided by law for the single piece, shall be legal tender only at valuation in proportion to their actual weight.

That is the amendment which is proposed to the last clause of the act referred to, approved May 12 of this year.

That is all that the joint resolution does.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The legal-tender feature covers all forms of currency, does it not?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; as I understand the Senator's question.

Mr. FESS. It includes national-bank notes?

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. FESS. That is a thing that never has been thought of before.

Mr. FLETCHER. It was already done. That was provided for in the Agricultural Relief Act to which I have just referred.

Mr. FESS. It was never done except under this "new deal" idea.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; it was done under the agricultural relief or agricultural adjustment act, approved May 12, 1933.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. KEAN. Is it not true that during the 100 years or more of the history of the United States, the bonds of the United States have always been payable in gold, even during the Civil War; that both customs and interest on United States bonds were payable in gold?

Mr. FLETCHER. I think that is true, and that is one trouble now. We have been carried away by this fetish of gold, and tied to that kind of a system; and that has brought on the difficulties we are having. We are trying to get away from it. There is nothing sacred about gold as a commodity. It is not money, except as we may make it money, and that has led to what is happening all over the world, more or less, but particularly in the United States in this emergency.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I call the attention of the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] to the fact that there was a time when United States bonds were payable in gold and silver.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes; I think that is true, too.

The constitutional provisions on the subject will be found in section 8 of article I of the Constitution, as follows:

> The Congress shall have power * * * to borrow money on the credit of the United States; * * * to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, * * * and * * * to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers.

It is under that authority that we are proceeding here, and it amply sustains every provision of this joint resolution.

Congress has an unquestioned power to determine, in its discretion, the value of the dollar. Furthermore, a determination once made is not final, but may be changed from time to time. That is an answer to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN]. It matters not what we have done in the past; we have the right and the authority and the power to change our policy, if we see fit, to meet the present conditions.

The act of April 7, 1792, provided that the content of the gold dollar should be 24.75 grains of pure gold. The fine weight of the gold dollar was reduced by the act of June 28, 1834; and the standard of fineness was changed by act of January 18, 1837. The Supreme Court has stated:

> No one ever doubted that a debt of $1,000, contracted before 1834, could be paid by 100 eagles coined after that year, though they contained no more gold than 94 eagles such as were coined when the contract was made.

That was decided in the Legal Tender cases, Twelfth Wallace, 457.

The Supreme Court has held that the Congress has power to provide for the issuance of currency and to make such currency legal tender in payment of debts. That is what we are attempting to do.

In the Legal Tender cases, with which Senators are more or less familiar, the court held that the currency to which the Legal Tender cases referred was authorized as a war-time measure. In Juilliard v. Greenman (110 U.S. 421) the court upheld the exercise of the same power in peace time, and said:

> The power of making the notes of the United States a legal tender in payment of private debts, being included in the power to borrow money and to provide a national currency, is not defeated or restricted by the fact that its exercise may affect the value of private contracts.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The Senator has read the decision that makes the United States greenback a legal tender.

Mr. FLETCHER. Yes.

Mr. FESS. That was an obligation of the Government. A national-bank note is not an obligation of the Government. That is what I am asking.

I am not questioning whether we have the authority to make the United States note a legal tender. That is the promise of the Government. If we want to go to that extent, there is no question about the legality of doing it; but here we are proceeding to make a thing that is not a Government obligation a legal tender.

Mr. FLETCHER. National-bank notes are guaranteed by the Government.

Mr. FESS. They are not a Government obligation, however. The Senator does not think a national-bank note is a Government obligation, does he?

Mr. FLETCHER. No; but it is guaranteed by the Government.

Mr. REED. It is not even that.

Mr. FLETCHER. We have the power to do that very thing, and the right to do it. Those notes are sufficiently protected, secured as they are by bonds of the United States, and are sound as a basis of currency, and used and circulated as currency. We can declare them to be legal tender. There is no question about that.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. In what are these legal-tender notes redeemable?

Mr. FLETCHER. To which notes does the Senator refer?

Mr. HATFIELD. The bank notes that are being made legal tender, payable for any kind of an obligation. What is back of these notes in the way of a redeemer—gold or silver?

Mr. FLETCHER. At present there is back of the notes Government bonds, if the Senator is referring to national-bank notes.

Mr. HATFIELD. What will be the process of redemption after the passage of this joint resolution?

Mr. FLETCHER. They will go to the Treasurer of the United States, and he will redeem them.

Mr. HATFIELD. In what?

Mr. FLETCHER. In the currency that we are going to issue; in currency, legal tender.

Then Congress has the power of providing for a uniform currency. That is one of the things we need. The power of Congress to issue currency includes the power to secure a uniform currency for the whole country. That, of course, was decided when the tax was levied on State banks and had the effect of preventing the issuance of currency by State banks; and that has been the law ever since.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I have before me a speech which was delivered by Senator Ingalls, one of the outstanding Members of the Senate of the United States at one time, in which he sets forth the various acts upon this subject. He states that in the act of February 17, 1862, the Congress made its obligations payable not in gold but in coin; that the act of July 11, 1862, made its obligations payable not in gold but in coin. The same thing was done in 1863, 1864, and 1865. Practically all these obligations were not payable in gold at all, but payable in coin, either in silver or gold.

Mr. FLETCHER. Undoubtedly that is true; and Congress has that power today, just as it had then.

Mr. WHEELER. Just as it had then.

If the Senator will pardon me further, Mr. Ingalls calls attention to what some of the British papers said upon this subject with reference to repudiation. In view of the fact that some of the Senators have stated that this would be a repudiation by the United States Government, I shall at a later time call attention to specific articles taken from the journals of Great Britain at that time.

Mr. FLETCHER. As a matter of fact, there is no repudiation at all here. There may be technically a repudiation of the obligation to pay in gold; but if we pay in something that is worth just as much, that is just as valuable for every purpose that money can be used for as gold, we have not repudiated anything. Nobody has lost anything. We are actually paying today in dollars a dollar and a half for what we promised to pay a dollar for when our bonds were issued.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is it not true, as a practical matter of fact, that if everybody who holds an obligation against the United States Government should demand gold in payment, we have not enough gold to pay one fourth of the obligations now outstanding? And is it not true that if everybody in this country who holds an obligation, public or private, in which this gold clause may be included should demand payment, there is not one twentieth enough gold in the entire United States to redeem all these bonds?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Florida yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. REED. Is not that just the same——

Mr. BARKLEY. Furthermore, I might add——

Mr. REED. The Senator yielded to me, I think. I wanted to ask a question, and I should like the attention of the Senator from Kentucky. His argument that these contracts amount to nothing because their sum total exceeds the amount of gold in the world is about like arguing that nobody ought to be allowed to walk down Pennsylvania Avenue because the entire population cannot all do it at the same moment.

At the time these bonds were issued there were more bonds out than there are now, and there was less gold in the world than there is now; and, according to the Senator from Kentucky, President Wilson and his administration committed a fraud upon the bondholder when they issued more bonds than there was gold. Of course, they meant, and every other person who promises to pay in gold means, that he will get back the gold from the first comer, paying a premium if necessary, in order to honor his covenant with the second comer. That has always been understood.

The argument of the Senator from Kentucky would mean that no bank had to pay its depositors, because the aggregate of the bank deposits of the United States is very much greater than every form of currency in the United States, and obviously every depositor cannot be paid at the same instant.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Florida yield further there?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, the analogy is not correct, because anybody knows that if a bank is solvent, and a depositor goes to draw out his deposits, he draws them out in any kind of money that is available to the bank.

Furthermore, I dare say that there is not one out of a million dollars of these obligations, whether public or private, ever paid in gold. The people bought Liberty bonds, and they bought all the other bonds, on the faith of the Government of the United States, and they would have bought them just the same if there had been no gold clause in them. They are not paid in gold. It is a sort of fetish of antiquity that they carry the gold clause. As a matter of fact, we know that practically they are never paid in gold, nobody expects them to be paid in gold, and they would have sold just as readily if the gold clause had not been in them.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, on that subject I read from a pamphlet entitled "Gold! Why?" by Charles F. de Ganahl. He says:

> The outstanding bonds of the Government now approximate $18,000,000,000; the outstanding currency in the United States of America is about $10,000,000,000. A total liability of $28,000,000,000.
> The metallic gold security behind this vast promise to pay of the people of the United States of America is of the order of $4,000,000,000 in gold.

In other words, we have $4,000,000,000 of gold with which to pay $28,000,000,000 of obligations.

> That is, twenty-four billion is without actual gold backing and could not be met in gold. This twenty-four billion is "promised gold money"—if bonds may be considered equal to money, and they are equal to money, through a cumbersome process of borrowing against these bonds.

Mr. President, that is the situation. Of course, there is much in what the Senator says. These bonds will not all be presented at once, yet we have $24,000,000,000 of obligations payable in gold and $4,000,000,000 of gold with which to meet them.

Mr. KEAN and Mr. REED addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. NEELY in the chair). Does the Senator from Florida yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. KEAN. In reply to the Senator from Kentucky, I may say that I went out and helped sell Liberty bonds, and that I told the people that they were payable in gold, and that the United States would make good.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KEAN. And the people expect them to be paid in gold. Within 3 weeks from this time the Secretary of the Treasury of this administration has issued notes of the United States payable in gold. Is his promise good, or whose promise is good? What can anybody depend on if we assume that the promise of the last Democratic administration is not good, and this administration starts out, within 30 days of the time when it has promised to pay certificates in gold, and repudiates its promise?

Mr. FLETCHER. Suppose the Senator had a thousand dollars in Liberty bonds, or any other bonds, payable in gold, and they were due. He would go to the bank. Would he ask for gold for them? He would take currency, he would take legal tender.

Mr. KEAN. I would either take the gold or its equivalent for them. As the currency of the United States has now gone off nearly 20 percent, I would pay any such creditor of mine 120 percent for his debt.

Mr. FLETCHER. We preserve the parity in every respect, and what one would get in currency is legal tender of the United States, lawful money.

Mr. FESS. How is the Senator proposing to preserve the parity?

Mr. KEAN. Yes; how is the parity being preserved?

Mr. FLETCHER. The Senator would not think of walking out of his bank with a thousand dollars in gold in his pocket.

Mr. KEAN. How does the Senator propose to preserve the parity, when the currency of the United States, as measured by foreign governments, is already nearly 20 percent less than the value of gold today?

Mr. FLETCHER. There is an embargo on the export of gold, and the Senator would not spend that money in foreign countries, anyway.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I cannot follow the Senator in any such statement as that, because the farmers of this country, the wheat growers of this country, the cotton growers of this country, send their products abroad, and they will find that they will get less money in return for their crops than they ever got before.

Mr. FLETCHER. On the contrary, they will get more and are getting more, and they will get more still. The effect will be to increase the prices of the commodities.

The classic statement of the proper construction of congressional powers is that of Chief Justice Marshall in McCulloch v. Maryland (4 Wheat. 316):

> Let the end be legitimate, let it be within the scope of the Constitution, and all means which are appropriate, which are plainly adapted to that end, which are not prohibited, but consistent with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, are constitutional * * *. Where the law is not prohibited, and is really calculated to effect any of the objects entrusted to the Government, to undertake here to inquire into the degree of its necessity would be to pass the line which circumscribes the judicial Department and to tread on legislative ground. This Court disclaims all pretentions to such a power (pp. 421 and 423).

If in the exercise of its expressed powers to borrow money and to coin money and regulate its value, the Congress finds that provisions which purport to give to the obligee a right to require payment in gold—the basis of the Nation's currency—or in any particular kind of money, or in an amount in money measured thereby, obstruct the power of Congress to regulate the value of money and are inconsistent with the declared policy of Congress to maintain at all times the equal power of every dollar coined or issued by the United States, in the markets and in the payment of debts, the Supreme Court will accept such finding. If the Congress adopts appropriate and reasonable means to prevent the interference of such provisions with the exercise of its power to regulate the value of the money of the United States, the Supreme Court will uphold such action as a valid exercise of the implied powers of the Congress.

In Veazie Bank v. Fenno (8 Wall. 533), the Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of a tax on State bank notes used for circulation, the avowed purpose of the tax being to drive the circulating notes out of existence in order to create a uniform currency. The Court held that such action by Congress in pursuance of its powers to coin money and to regulate the value thereof included the power to take appropriate steps to assure "a currency uniform in value and description, and convenient and useful for circulation." The Court said:

> Having thus, in the exercise of undisputed constitutional powers, undertaken to provide a currency for the whole country, it cannot be questioned that Congress may, constitutionally, secure the benefit of it to the people by appropriate legislation. To this end, Congress has denied the quality of legal tender to foreign coins, and has provided by law against the imposition of counterfeit and base coin on the community. To the same end, Congress may restrain, by suitable enactments, the circulation as money of any notes not issued under its own authority. Without this power, indeed, its attempts to secure a sound and uniform currency for the country must be futile (p. 549). (Italics supplied.)

In Juillard against Greenman, cited above, the Court stated:

> Under the power to borrow money on the credit of the United States, and to issue circulating notes for the money borrowed, its power to define the quality and force of those notes as currency is as broad as the like power over a metallic currency under the power to coin money and to regulate the value thereof. Under the two powers, taken together, Congress is authorized to establish a national currency, either in coin or in paper, and to make that currency lawful money for all purposes, as regards the National Government or private individuals (p. 448).

In the Legal Tender cases, cited above, Mr. Justice Strong said:

> Every contract for the payment of money, simply, is necessarily subject to the constitutional power of the Government over the currency, whatever that power may be, and the obligation of the parties is, therefore, assumed with reference to that power (p. 549).

And Mr. Justice Bradley stated in his concurring opinion:

> I do not understand the majority of the court to decide that an act so drawn as to embrace, in terms, contracts payable in specie, would not be constitutional. Such a decision would completely nullify the power claimed for the Government. For it would be very easy, by the use of 1 or 2 additional words, to make all contracts payable in specie (p. 567).

NOT A TAKING OF PROPERTY WITHOUT DUE PROCESS OF LAW

The joint resolution provides that every obligation, whether or not it contains a gold clause, shall be discharged upon payment, dollar for dollar, in legal tender. From a material point of view the obligee suffers no damage if what he receives is of equal value with what he claims. At the present time, all currency and coins, including gold coins, are equal in purchasing power within the United States. Against the delivery of gold coins to Federal Reserve banks in amount in currency is paid which will in turn repurchase the same amount of gold coins for duly licensed purposes. The export of gold is, however, forbidden by Congress in the exercise of powers admittedly constitutional. See Ling Su Fan v. United States (218 U.S. 302). Therefore, the joint resolution, in fact, does not subject the obligee to any material damage, and he cannot claim to have suffered any deprivation of property unless and until he can show some material damage.

In this connection mention should be made of the decision of the Supreme Court, New York County, N.Y., reached May 24, 1933, in the case of Irving Trust Co., etc., v. Hazlewood, etc. (N.Y. Law Jour. of May 26, 1933, p. 3160). In his opinion Mr. Justice Ingraham stated:

> By Presidential proclamation all gold coin and gold certificates have been withdrawn from circulation. Upon surrender of gold coin or certificates the holder has received other currency of equal coin value. The case of Bronson v. Rodes (74 U.S. 229) is not in point. Different circumstances there prevailed. Two varieties of money were in general circulation: the gold dollar and the paper dollar. The latter had a much depreciated value. At the present time there is but one lawful medium of exchange, and this has the same coin value as gold of equal amount. The case of In re Societe Intercommunale Belge d'Electricite-Feist v. The Company, decided by the Court of Appeals of England in March of this year and reported in the Times Law Reports (p. 344), decides the question involved here. I accordingly instruct the trustees to accept current funds and upon payment of the amount due to satisfy the mortgage.

Even should the Congress fail to maintain the parity of all coins and currencies and their equal power in the markets and payments of debts so as to give rise to the contention that the effect of such failure combined with the effect of the resolution would amount to a taking of property, this would not be without due process of law. Bronson against Rodes did not decide that Congress could not have made notes legal tender for obligations payable in a particular kind of money. Its actual holding was a construction of the Legal Tender Act of 1862 to the effect that it was not intended by Congress to apply to obligations expressed as payable in gold and silver coin, lawful money of the United States.

In the Legal Tender cases the Court said:

> Nor can it be truly asserted that Congress may not, by its action, indirectly impair the obligation of contracts, if by the expression be meant rendering contracts fruitless or partially fruitless. Directly it may, confessedly, by passing a bankrupt act, embracing past as well as future transactions. This is obliterating contracts entirely. So it may relieve parties from their apparent obligations indirectly in a multitude of ways. It may declare war, or even in peace pass nonintercourse acts, or direct an embargo. All such measures may, and must, operate seriously upon existing contracts, and may not merely hinder but relieve the parties to such contracts entirely from performance. It is, then, clear that the powers of Congress may be exerted, though the effect of such exertion may be in one case to annul and in other cases to impair the obligation of contracts * * * (pp. 549, 550).

In the same decision the Court deals in like manner with the "closely allied" objection that the Legal Tender Acts "were prohibited by the spirit of the fifth amendment, which forbids taking private property for public use without just compensation or due process of law." It states:

> * * * That provision has always been understood as referring only to a direct appropriation and not the consequential injuries resulting from the exercise of lawful power. It has never been supposed to have any bearing upon or to inhibit laws that indirectly work harm and loss to individuals. A new tariff, an embargo, a draft, or a war may inevitably bring upon individuals great losses; may, indeed, render valuable property almost valueless. They may destroy the worth of contracts. But whoever supposed that, because of this, a tariff could not be changed, or a nonintercourse act, or an embargo be enacted, or a war be declared? By the act of June 28, 1834, a new regulation of the weight and value of gold coin was adopted, and about 6 percent was taken from the weight of each dollar. The effect of this was that all creditors were subjected to a corresponding loss. The debts then due became solvable with 6 percent less gold than was required to pay them before. The result was thus precisely what it is contended the Legal Tender Acts worked. But was it ever imagined this was taking private property without compensation or without due process of law? * * * (p. 551).

The Supreme Court upheld the Philippine law prohibiting the exportation of silver coin from the Philippine Islands upon similar reasoning (Ling Su Fan v. United States, 218 U.S. 302). It was contended that the statute was a taking of property without due process of law. The Supreme Court stated:

> To justify the exercise of such a power it is only necessary that it shall appear that the means are reasonably adapted to conserve the general public interest and are not an arbitrary interference with private rights of contract or property. The law here in question is plainly within the limits of the police power and not an arbitrary or unreasonable interference with private rights. If a local coinage was demanded by the general interest of the Philippine Islands, legislation reasonably adequate to maintain such coinage at home as a medium of exchange is not a violation of private right forbidden by the organic law (p. 311).

The case of Louisville & Nashville Railroad v. Mottley (219 U.S. 467) is directly in point, although the statute which operated as an impairment of the obligation of contract was passed in pursuance of the commerce power of Congress. The defendant railroad agreed in settlement of a claim for personal injury to issue to the plaintiffs annual passes upon its lines for the remainder of their lives. Thereafter an act of Congress prohibited carriers from receiving a different compensation than that specified in their published tariffs. This was construed to prohibit the issuance of the passes in question. The Supreme Court denied the right of the plaintiffs to specific performance of their contracts with the railroad. The court said:

> The agreement between the railroad company and the Mottleys must necessarily be regarded as having been made subject to the possibility that, at some future time, Congress might so exert its whole constitutional power in regulating interstate commerce as to render that agreement unenforceable or to impair its value. That the exercise of such power may be hampered or restricted to any extent by contracts previously made between individuals or corporations is inconceivable. The framers of the Constitution never intended any such state of things to exist (p. 482).

Also of importance at this point are the broad statements of the Supreme Court in Julliard against Greenman and Veazie Bank against Fenno, quoted above in this memorandum. Furthermore, while it is not contended that the operation of constitutional guaranties may be suspended by an emergency, the Supreme Court has in actual practice—as for example in dealing with the emergency rent legislation made necessary by the World War, as well as in other cases—taken into consideration, both in the general construction of the powers of Congress and in the application of the due-process clause, the existing practical emergency which the congressional enactment was designed to meet. Obviously such an approach would be peculiarly justified by the exigencies of the present economic emergency.

OUTSTANDING GOVERNMENT OBLIGATIONS

The foregoing discussion applies to provisions contained in obligations of the Government as well as obligations of private persons. It is fundamental that "governmental powers cannot be contracted away" (North American Com. Co. v. United States, 171 U. S. 110, 137; Fertilizing Co. v. Hyde Park, 97 U. S. 659) and rights conferred by the Government remain subject to the power of Congress "to make regulations in the exertion of the authority of Congress over matters within its constitutional power" (United States v. United Shoe Machinery Co., 258 U. S. 451, 463, and 464; Shaus v. American Publishers Association, 231 U. S. 222, 234; Horowitz v. United States, 267 U. S. 458; United States v. Warren Transportation Co., 7 Fed. (2d) 161).

When Congress finds and declares that the effect of the enforcement of certain provisions of obligations, including obligations to which the Government is a party, obstruct the powers of the Congress and are inconsistent with its policy to maintain all coins and currencies at a parity, appropriate action to protect the monetary system of the United States is constitutional, even though persons holding obligations of the United States are affected equally with all other obligees. Indeed, to discriminate in favor of creditors of the Government and against creditors of private obligors would, in the absence of facts making such discrimination necessary for the accomplishment of a valid purpose, lay the legislation open to attack as capricious and arbitrary.

Furthermore, when, as is now the case, a limitation of the effect of the legislation to contracts between private persons and future contracts of the Government would seriously impair the power of the Government to borrow money to meet its general needs and to cope with the necessities of the emergency, the constitutional power to take such action cannot be doubted.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, men's honor is not often improved by being discussed, nor is it often proved by being asserted. I think this matter before us involves the most serious question of national dishonor that has arisen in the Congress in my recollection. I think it is much more important to consider this question from the standpoint of national honesty and national honor than it is to split hairs on constitutional construction, and the letter of that charter of our liberties to which we so often refer, and so seldom follow:

Before I discuss the moralities of this proposal, I want to call attention briefly, so that it may be said in the future that these things were not omitted in the Senate from consideration, to that part of the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution which, in section 4, says:

> The validity of the public debt of the United States authorized by law * * * shall not be questioned.

Obviously, this proposed statute now presented to us does question the validity of that part of the public debt authorized by law which directs that the promise contained in it shall be expressed to be payable in gold of the standard of value at the time the bonds are issued. Plainly, the proposed statute ignores that prohibition of the fourteenth amendment.

Furthermore, it flies directly in the face of the due-process clause of the fifth amendment, because it is taking from the bondholder a part of his property without due process of law. The bond is property; the bond consists only of a series of covenants. To take from the bondholder any one of those covenants takes a part of his property; and to say that he is receiving due process of law because he is paid in the debased money of the present day is a palpable absurdity, self-evidently untrue, recognized to be untrue by those decisions of the Supreme Court rendered in our last fever of inflation, back in the late sixties and the early seventies, when the Supreme Court in repeated cases recognized that it was not due process of law; that it was not satisfaction of the debt to pay in paper money a debt expressed to be paid in terms of gold, and as a consequence directed judgment to be entered in the two different kinds of money. For the failure to be paid in money, the Supreme Court of the United States directed judgment to be rendered either in that amount of gold dollars or in an increased amount of currency dollars.

I have before me the case of Dewing against Sears, which is found in Eleventh Wallace, page 379. In that case the yearly rent had been expressed to be 4 ounces, 2 pennyweights, and 12 grains of pure gold in coined money. That was equivalent, when the lease was made, to $80 per annum, and at the time when the suit was brought, to $87.25 per annum, in this debased currency. Judgment was directed to be entered by the Supreme Court for coined dollars and parts of coined dollars, and not for United States notes, although those notes had been made by statutes of the United States a legal tender. That followed two earlier cases, Bronson v. Rodes (7 Wallace, 229) and Butler v. Horwitz (7 Wallace, 258). In the Bronson case the Supreme Court said this:

> Payment of money is delivery by the debtor to the creditor of the amount due. A contract to pay a certain number of dollars in gold or silver coins is, therefore, in legal import, nothing else than an agreement to deliver a certain weight of standard gold, to be ascertained by a count of coins, each of which is certified to contain a definite proportion of that weight. It is not distinguishable, as we think, in principle, from a contract to deliver an equal weight of bullion of equal fineness. It is distinguishable, in circumstance, only by the fact that the sufficiency of the amount to be tendered in payment must be ascertained, in the case of bullion, by assay and the scales, while in the case of coin it may be ascertained by count.

And in the Legal Tender cases—I speak of the Legal Tender cases in Twelfth Wallace, page 457—the Court took good care, on page 48 of its opinion, to distinguish between contracts for the payment of money generally, which, of course, were subject to the power of Congress to regulate the value of the money, and contracts to pay in specially defined species of money. The Court said there:

> It is true that under the acts a debtor, who became such before they were passed, may discharge his debt with the notes authorized by them, and the creditor is compellable to receive such notes in discharge of his claim. But whether the obligation of the contract is thereby weakened can be determined only after considering what was the contract obligation. It was not a duty to pay gold or silver, or the kind of money recognized by law at the time when the contract was made, nor was it a duty to pay money of equal intrinsic value in the market. (We speak now of contracts to pay money generally, not contracts to pay some specifically defined species of money.)

I need not quote from the cases any further.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator from Pennsylvania?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Under the act of 1861 greenbacks, as we call them, were made full legal tender.

Mr. REED. That is correct.

Mr. FLETCHER. It was in 1862 when Congress put on the limitation that greenbacks could not be used for the payment of taxes, custom duties, and so forth, and therefore limited the legal-tender qualities of the greenbacks by that act. The Supreme Court simply held that Congress did not provide in the act of 1862 that they should be payable in coin or anything of that sort, but the Court did not hold that Congress did not have the power to make greenbacks legal tender if it desired so to do.

Mr. REED. No; they did not. They assumed, with an air that implied it was a violent assumption, that Congress had the power to pass such a statute if it specifically tried to, but then they construed the statute to mean that Congress had not meant anything so preposterous.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Pennsylvania yield there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. FESS. The first issue of $60,000,000 to which the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER] refers was not really an issue of greenbacks, because they were redeemable in gold on demand. Those were the terms of that issue, that the greenbacks should be redeemable in gold on demand, and it was not the refusal to make that issue a legal tender for the payment of customs duties and interest on the public debt that caused it to stay up; it was because it was equivalent to gold, that anybody who had any of the notes of that first issue could take them to the Treasury and get gold for them at any time.

Mr. REED. Yes; and when the United States did not have enough gold to redeem them it was under obligation to go out and get the gold. That, in fact, was what was done later on after specie payments were resumed.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. REED. Let me first answer the Senator's query about the courts passing on the constitutionality of such a bill as this. In Butler against Horwitz, on page 260 of the opinion, as it is found in Seventh Wallace, the Court said:

> It was not necessary in the case of Bronson v. Rodes, nor is it necessary now, to decide the question whether the acts making United States notes legal tender are warranted by the Constitution. We express no opinion on that point, but assume for the present the constitutionality of those acts.

Then they say:

> Proceeding upon this assumption, we find two descriptions of lawful money in use under acts of Congress.

And they go on to say that judgments should be rendered in metallic coins or in paper money the equivalent of such metallic coins, not the face equivalent but the purchasing equivalent. That began the practice of entering judgments in the two kinds of money. A breach of a contract to pay gold, under these cases, was compensated for by a judgment to pay the currency value of the gold, which was far beyond its nominal parity.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. The paper money equivalent would be equal to the difference in the value between the paper money and the redeemer; that is, gold or silver on a silver basis.

Mr. REED. Precisely. Mr. President, enough of the constitutional question.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me before he leaves the constitutional phase of the question?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. REED. I yield first to the Senator from Ohio, and then I will yield to the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FESS. In the list of prohibitions upon the States written in the Constitution it is provided that the States may not change the obligations of a contract.

Mr. REED. That is correct.

Mr. FESS. There was written no such inhibition on the Federal Government. The question has been raised, Why would the makers of the Constitution forbid that power to the State and not inhibit it to the General Government? The suggestion has been made whether that question is not answered by the provision forbidding ex post facto legislation.

Mr. REED. No. An ex post facto law is one passed after the event and is almost always applicable only to criminal or quasi-criminal cases. Such a law is an effort to make an act a crime or impose a penalty for an act after the act has occurred. That is what is meant by an ex post facto law.

Mr. FESS. To make a crime of some act that was not a crime at the time it was committed?

Mr. REED. Yes; but there is no question of crime involved here. In the last clauses of the fifth amendment, however, we find the due process of law limitation on the action of the Federal Government, and that has been construed in a long row of cases to prevent the taking of property by legislative action without suitable compensation to the person whose property is taken.

Mr. FESS. The query that is in the mind of many questioners is why the framers of the Constitution did not write an inhibition against the Government itself invalidating contracts when it did write such an inhibition with reference to the States.

Mr. REED. I remember there was some discussion of that, and it is reported, I think, in the Federalist, but I do not remember it sufficiently well to undertake now to repeat it. If any other Senator does, I shall be glad to yield to him at the moment.

Mr. FESS. My understanding is from reading the reports that the makers of the Constitution never assumed that the Government would perform that kind of an act.

Mr. REED. I think that was the real reason, but I do not remember the expression of it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have never seen any answer to the question which the Senator from Ohio asks. The debates on the Constitution give no intimation; there is no suggestion in regard to it, and I know of no answer to the question, except the fact that the framers of the Constitution simply did not do it. However, it can hardly be said that they did not do it because they assumed the National Government would not do such a thing when they did assume that the States would do such a thing, the States being composed of the same people who as a whole make up the National Government.

Mr. REED. I think probably, in all truth, it was an inadvertence, or if it was not an inadvertence, it was not considered a very necessary precaution. So far as I know, this is the first time that an act of the kind that is now pending before us has been presented in the American Congress.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. FLETCHER. I should like to call attention for a moment to the opinion of Mr. Justice Strong in the Legal Tender cases, in which he said in part:

> Every contract for the payment of money, simply, is necessarily subject to the constitutional power of the Government over the currency, whatever that power may be, and the obligation of the parties is, therefore, assumed with reference to that power.

I think the reason this matter of the impairment of contracts by the Federal Government was left out of the Constitution was because the framers of the Constitution wanted to preserve the absolute sovereignty of the Federal Government.

Then Mr. Justice Bradley said in his concurring opinion:

> I do not understand the majority of the court to decide that an act so drawn as to embrace, in terms, contracts payable in specie, would not be constitutional. Such a decision would completely nullify the power claimed for the Government. For it would be very easy, by the use of one or two additional words, to make all contracts payable in specie.

Mr. REED. That, however, was not the majority opinion.

Mr. FLETCHER. No; that was a concurring minority opinion by Mr. Justice Bradley.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, let us leave off the discussion of the dry constitutional phase of this subject and return to the question of the essential honesty of it.

Last November 4, 3 days before the election, President Roosevelt made a speech in Brooklyn in which he criticized bitterly his adversary, Mr. Hoover, for having implied at Des Moines that the United States was in danger of going off the gold standard. After denouncing that "gospel of fear" this is what he said:

> The business men of the country, battling hard to maintain their financial solvency and integrity, were told in blunt language in Des Moines, Iowa, how close an escape this country had some months ago from going off the gold standard. But that, my friends, as has been clearly shown since, was a libel on the credit of the United States.

Passing over the fact that a libel must be written and that President Hoover's Des Moines speech was only spoken, we will assume that Mr. Roosevelt meant "a slander upon the credit of the United States." Later on in his speech——

Mr. WHEELER. I understand the speech of President Hoover at Des Moines was written, so that it would be a libel.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. In any event, it was published.

Mr. REED. The speech may have been slanderous of the credit of the United States, and its printing and publication may have been libelous. It is evident, however, that Mr. Roosevelt meant to express the indignation which rose from the bottom of his soul at the very suggestion that anybody should say that the United States was in danger of going off the gold standard. To make that so plain that even the people of Brooklyn would understand him, he followed with this statement:

> It is worthy of note that no adequate answer has been made to the magnificent philippic of Senator GLASS the other night, in which he showed how unsound this position was; and I might add Senator GLASS made a devastating challenge that no responsible government would have sold to the country securities payable in gold if it knew that the promise—yes, the covenant, embodied in these securities—was as dubious as the President of the United States claims it was.

That shining knight, campaigning for the national honor, capitivated the people of this country by those phrases; they elected him to office by an enormous majority, and he was inaugurated in March. It came to pass that it was necessary to borrow money in April, and on April 23 of this selfsame year Mr. Roosevelt's administration put out $500,000,000 in Treasury notes, payable in gold of the present standard and value. That was done on the 23d of April, Mr. President, by the administration of this honorable man, who said:

> No responsible government would have sold to the country securities payable in gold if it knew that the promise—yes, the covenant embodied in those securities—was as dubious as the President of the United States claims it was.

If that covenant is dubious today it was more so on April 23. If the United States cannot honor that promise now, it knew on April 23 that it could not. If the gold embargo is an excuse for dishonoring it now, the gold embargo was in force on April 23.

How can we, as a part of the Government of the United States, look in the face of the debtor to whom we sold bonds by making that promise less than 6 weeks ago? How can we face him in self-respect? We took $500,000,000 of money from the people of the United States on April 23 in the reliance on their part upon our promise to pay in gold coin of the present standard of value. Never did any confidence man or trickster pull off a more dishonorable performance than that, if it was then in mind that we were to repudiate the outstanding promises of the United States to pay in gold or its equivalent.

The Supreme Court showed us back in the Civil War days how it is possible to pay in gold equivalent without trying to pay, as suggested by the Senator, $2 of liability with $1 of gold coin. What a feeble excuse that is for our repudiation—what a feeble excuse, when the Secretaries of the Treasury during the war time issued $26,000,000,000 of gold bonds to carry on the war, every one of them containing that promise to pay in gold value, and at that time there was not in all the world mined gold equal to $26,000,000,000.

Adding together all the coinage of all the nations, and all the gold that is used in the arts and all the gold that has been smelted since the smelting of gold ore began, it did not equal $26,000,000,000, and to say that is an excuse now for dishonoring that promise is pitiful. As I tried to say to the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] awhile ago, it is like saying to the whole population of the United States, "None of you may walk down Pennsylvania Avenue because you could not all do it at the same moment."

Money is a circulating medium, and yet the very suggestion that is made by our friends on the other side of the aisle is that the gold that pays these bonds ceases to circulate the instant it is paid, and that that which is paid to the first comer cannot circulate and cannot be brought back to the Federal Treasury for use to pay again. Any child who understands what money is could answer that suggestion.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from West Virginia?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. HATFIELD. The Government of the United States had a national debt represented in bonds that had been issued during the war days. A few years after the end of the war the bonded indebtedness of the Government of the United States was reduced by the then Treasurer of the United States between $8,000,000,000 and $9,000,000,000 notwithstanding there was only $11,000,000,000 of gold in the world. Is not that true?

Mr. REED. That is quite true.

Mr. HATFIELD. Indicating that it is the velocity with which money moves that meets the obligations and not the amount of money.

Mr. REED. Why, of course. After all, if we will preserve a self-respecting currency of stable value with a recognized gold equivalent, nobody will ever ask for the metallic gold in payment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Can the Senator from Pennsylvania or any Senator tell us how much of the $8,000,000,000 or $9,000,000,000 reduction was brought about by the payment of a single dollar in gold?

Mr. REED. I doubt if any was, because the money of the United States was on a self-respecting basis and the people were satisfied to accept a gold equivalent. Currency and gold were interchangeable, and as long as they are nobody wants gold. The people only want it when it is hard to get.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will the passage of this joint resolution make any form of money, either currency or metallic, any less desirable on the part of the people of the United States?

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. BARKLEY. Will they be any less willing to accept either gold or its equivalent, either in silver or currency based upon gold, as they have always been?

Mr. REED. The Senator asks the result. Its immediate result will be just as it has been of recent days, to drive down the gold value of United States currency. We have seen that in the foreign exchange quotations of the world. The dollar has been weakened and is pronouncedly weaker in its gold-purchasing power since this measure was introduced by the administration in the House of Representatives.

Mr. BARKLEY. Has there not been a corresponding increase in the value of commodities?

Mr. REED. Of course.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is not that one of the objects of the effort to bring about a restoration of commodity prices?

Mr. REED. Of course.

Mr. BARKLEY. And is it not——

Mr. REED. I hope the Senator will let me proceed without interruption for just a moment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Very well.

Mr. REED. There are two kinds of panics. One is the sort of panic where people want to get rid of securities and get money in exchange. The other panic—and it is just as much panic as the first kind—is where they want to get rid of their money and get some kind of property in exchange.

That is what has been going on since March in this country. There is nothing in the business situation that would justify a rise in commodity and security prices so great as has occurred in these 3 months.

Mr. FESS and Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield, and if so, to whom?

Mr. REED. Let me proceed just a moment, and I shall be glad to yield to both Senators.

Mr. FESS. My observation is very pertinent to what the Senator is saying.

Mr. REED. I have no doubt the Senator from Arkansas was going to make a pertinent observation too.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I presume the Senator from Ohio does not think so.

Mr. REED. I will yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. I am sure the Senator from Arkansas had a pertinent observation to submit. On the subject of foreign exchange, letters coming from a personal friend of mine, who is in the Consular Service in France, state that his salary in May was 31 percent less in purchasing power than in April.

Mr. REED. That is because he received fewer francs for his dollar than he did a month before.

Mr. FESS. That is a practical observation.

Mr. REED. We have Army officers at present completing the building of some monuments in France. Wild appeals have come from them in recent days that their salaries, when translated into French francs, now are not sufficient to give them the barest livelihood over there. If we delude ourselves that the dollar has not gone down in gold value, we are just sticking our heads in the sand. It did not need to go down. We did not have to go off the gold standard; but we did it, and as a result, an inevitable result, prophesied then when that bill was pending, the dollar has gone down in its gold equivalent, and prices normally have gone up; but they have only gone up as expressed in our rubber money. They have not gone up anything like as much expressed in gold.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. REED. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. We went off the gold standard because practically every country in the world had depreciated its currency, and consequently our world trade was being wrecked by reason of those countries going off the gold standard. The world manufacturing trade was being captured by the Chinese and the Japanese and they were selling their manufactured products so low that our manufacturers could not compete. The result was that the manufacturing plants in the Senator's own State and in the New England States and all over the United States were closed, and millions of our people were walking the streets because of the fact that we were clinging to the gold dollar.

That is the cause of it, and the trouble is with Senators on the other side of the Chamber, or at least some of them, that under this administration, when we no longer want to cling to the fetish of the gold standard, they see commodities going up and people going back to work in their factories, and it makes them angry. Let me predict if we do remain on the gold standard and still keep the high-class dollar, it will be very difficult to say what will happen to the United States of America. It is difficult to say what would have happened if the theory and the idea now being advocated by the Senator from Pennsylvania had been continued.

Mr. REED. If the Senator's remarks are intended as a question, the answer is "no." [Laughter.]

Mr. WHEELER. Of course, I expected that answer.

Mr. REED. Of course, it is true that foreign countries have enjoyed a momentary advantage by depreciation of their currency. They have enjoyed it at the expense of their working people, just as today we are enjoying a sort of feverish prosperity at the expense of our working people because we have reduced their wages nearly 20 percent. They do not know it. They are beginning to suspect it as they see that their wages do not go so far in purchasing power. But the plain truth is, and in honesty we ought to say it to the working people, just as we warned them would be the case, that their wages have been cut 20 percent, and so we are better able to produce at their expense.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator now yield to me?

Mr. REED. I have been too yielding, but I yield to the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. A few moments ago the Senator declared that there are two kinds of panics. One kind is when those who have property are overanxious to get rid of it and exchange it for money. The other is when those who have money are overanxious to get rid of it in exchange for property. He stated that we are now in the midst of the second kind of panic, implying, I take it, that in his opinion commodity prices are now excessive. I wish to ask the Senator if that was the clear implication of his declaration that we now have a panic in which people are so anxious to get rid of their money that they are paying excessive prices for commodities?

Mr. REED. I do not know that I should say prices are excessive. They are not as high as in times of business activity.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Will the Senator yield further?

Mr. REED. No; I will not yield until I have finished my thought. But I do say that the rise in prices here has been very much greater than it has been in the other nations of the world during the last 3 months. That is particularly true with reference to commodities that have a world-wide market. Take tin, for example. Pig tin has gone up from about 25 cents a pound in March to about 40 cents a pound now, a rise of 60 percent. There has not been any such comparable rise in Great Britain where tin is dealt with as actively as it is here. The same thing has happened with reference to copper. The same thing has happened with reference to a great number of commodities which are dealt in on a world-wide market, and to the extent that the rise here exceeds the rise in other markets I say it is a false and spurious rise.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I would like to ask my final question on this subject. I do not wish to harass the Senator, as I think he knows.

Mr. REED. Yes; I know that. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. With respect to the panic which the Senator says we are now experiencing because of the excessive prices of commodities, does he feel that the present prices of commodities in the United States and of property in the United States are so high that he can with any degree of propriety characterize them as indicating a panic?

Mr. REED. Yes, Mr. President.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Let me finish my question. Does not the Senator feel that commodity and property prices are still so low that little property is moving, and the people are still holding to their money instead of exchanging it for property, and that this is the cause of the continuance of the depression, and to the extent that these facts and conditions exist the depression does continue?

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I desire to answer quite responsively.

I think commodity prices are still low. I want to see them go up for the good of the country; but I want to see them go up in a wholesome way, and not by false methods. I want to see my little grandson grow tall, but not by changing the yardstick that measures him. That is what is happening. Prices are growing tall, but we are using a rubber yardstick.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield right there?

Mr. REED. Yes; I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. Let me say to the Senator that the reason why our commodities were so low is this:

For instance, take the case of copper. The reason why copper was so low in the United States of America was because with the depreciated currencies of other countries, such as Mexico and Chile and Africa, they could send their copper to this country and sell it much lower than we could, because they were off the gold standard. The same thing was true of wheat. The same thing was true of cotton. The same thing was true of all commodities that had to be sold upon the world market.

I agree with the Senator that if those countries had come back to our standard and agreed upon a world value of gold and a world value of money it would not have been necessary for us to go off the gold standard. Certainly, however, one of two things was necessary, either that they should come back to the gold standard or else we had to go off it, or our markets were absolutely ruined.

Mr. REED. No; I do not agree at all. It was not necessary to do either of those things.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. REED. I have a notion to yield the floor. I beg the Senator's pardon for my impatience, but I have not had more than 1 sentence out of 10 in the last half hour. Will the Senator from Kentucky allow me to apologize to him and yield now?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will not only allow the Senator to apologize but I will allow him to proceed.

Mr. REED. I thank the Senator. I am almost through, Mr. President.

Last December the French Government repudiated their promise, to which they had pledged the national honor, to pay this Government an installment of interest upon the money that was advanced to them to aid them in reconstruction after the war period. They were amply able to pay; and I remember, as I look back to that, that I thought it was one of the greatest stains upon the honor of a nation that I had ever seen.

I want now almost to apologize for my thoughts at that time; because here are we, with the greatest reserve stock of gold that is possessed by any nation on earth, with our vaults literally bulging with it, with a comparatively moderate national debt, much lighter per capita than that of many other countries that are still paying their debts as they promised, with the ability to pay these interest coupons in gold undoubted, admitted; and we, by a statute which Congress is about to pass, I am afraid, are breaking a promise when we do not need to break it. We are saying to the people of the world—and I assure you that they are listening in other countries as well as this one—that the sacred promise of the United States is a scrap of paper only; that all the taunts we directed at France last December, or at Germany back in August 1914, about their failure to observe their solemn promises, are just as true of us as they were of them; that the honor of the United States is about to receive a stain from this action which we will not be able to erase for a hundred years.

Mr. President, it is nothing to treat flippantly. It is nothing to decide out of hand. I tell you, Mr. President, we are face to face with a crisis in American credit.

We will endure. The Nation is not going to explode into bolshevism. We will take the long upward path again, just as we did in 1878, and we will come back to honoring our promises in the specie in which we have promised to honor them. They did it then, those grandfathers of ours, and we can do it, and the national strength will enable us to do it. But for generations to come Americans will grow red around the ears when they think of the dishonest and dishonorable thing that this Congress did to the promise of the Nation, on the faith of which it took the wealth of its citizens into its coffers. When they think of what we did, I hope they will look back to see that some of us protested against doing it.

Now, Mr. President, I move to amend the pending joint resolution on page 2, line 10, by striking out the words "heretofore or", so that the words will read:

Every obligation, hereafter incurred.

If Congress wants to abolish the gold clause in future bonds, all well and good. I should vote for such a measure. To do it in past bonds is what I am trying to avoid by the proposal of this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED].

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, we have been here now some 3 months. During that time we have given the President of the United States authority under the Economy Act to reduce the expenses of the Government; and while a large majority of the Senate voted for that bill, I do not believe there is a Senator within the sound of my voice who approves the cuts made in the allowances to the battle-scarred veterans who rendered field service to their country in the Great War.

During the last session of Congress, day by day, the then distinguished junior Senator from Nebraska, Mr. Howell, arose to his feet and asked the Senate, "What are you going to do for the farmers?" My friend Senator Howell was a man of sterling character, sincere, able, and persistent. I had great respect for him and for his ability and courage. He rendered valuable service to his State and to his country while he was in the Senate. He has now gone to his reward.

But what have we done during this session for the farmer? We have passed a farm bill which taxes the processor for the benefit of the farmer. In other words, we have taxed one class of people to give a bounty to another, which I do not approve. But this is only a part of the bill, because in the same measure we gave power to the President to reduce by one half the number of grains in the gold dollar. We specified in the farm bill that the average price of wheat should be 88.4 cents a bushel. We specified that the average price of cotton should be 12.4 cents a pound. The prices at the time that bill was introduced were somewhere around 46 cents for wheat and 7 cents for cotton. As these were American prices and not foreign prices, it stands to reason that if the President reduces the gold dollar by one half, or to a value of 50 cents, wheat should at least double its price, which would practically be the equivalent of the price in the bill, and should cotton double its price that would be 14 cents; so that the farmer is fooled again.

When we forbade the exporting of gold, the value of the dollar in the markets of the world went down 10 percent. Two weeks ago it went down by another 5 percent; and almost daily since that time there has been a drop in its value.

This, of course, is a great boon to the speculator, and the stock market is boiling, but the majority of our people are not speculating. The man who, by the sweat of his brow and by denying himself, has put away money in the savings bank, or bought a Government bond, has lost in the last 2 months 18 percent of his savings. If we keep on, he may lose 50 percent of his savings.

It is going to take some time before the wages of the man who works for wages catch up to the rapid decrease in the value of the dollar; and while his expense of living is going to increase, it is going to be difficult for him to get his wages increased as fast as the dollar goes down.

I had hoped, when the President suspended gold exports, that that would only be a temporary measure, and that within a month or two, when grain and cotton bills began coming into exchanges, the effect would be that the United States would resume its position as a free gold country.

The Assistant Secretary of the Treasury appeared before the Banking and Currency Committee and said that he felt that the enactment of this joint resolution was essential to refinancing the Treasury. On the other hand, he acknowledged that practically all the Government obligations held by the banks that come due between now and the 1st of January of next year are held by the Federal Reserve banks; and as we passed the bill here giving the President of the United States authority to issue such bonds as he pleases, and practically to put them in the portfolios of the Federal Reserve banks, there is no excuse for going off the gold basis at this time, because all the President has to do is to offer those certificates to the Federal Reserve banks, and they will take them in exchange for the bonds that come due between now and the 1st of next January.

Mr. President, the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury also acknowledged that in Mr. Cleveland's time we bought gold so as to preserve the gold basis of the United States. He said that he was unwilling to buy it now because he thought that this was an easier way to handle the matter.

I am one of those who went out among the people and urged them to buy Liberty bonds. I told the organization which was formed for the purpose of selling Liberty bonds to the people that my boys and their boys were in the front lines, and that perhaps the failure of the loan might jeopardize their lives, and that therefore it was their duty and my duty to see that the bonds were sold. I said to them that Mr. Morgan and Mr. Rockefeller were only pikers when it came to selling a billion dollars of bonds, that there was but one place where a billion dollars could be had, and that was out of the pay rolls of the United States, and that their organization must have a representative stand at the paymaster's windows and insist that every man, when he got his wages, should take his share of this loan.

These bonds were pledged on the faith of the United States, to be payable in gold. Some of the people who bought them still hold those bonds. They represent the sweat and toil of the workers of the United States.

Much of the money realized on the bonds was loaned to foreign governments, and we are now asked not only to repudiate the contract made by a Democratic administration during the war, but it is also proposed that we relieve the foreign governments of a part of their debt, and saddle it on the back of the workingman of the United States.

The United States is not bankrupt. Its people still have courage to go ahead. They still have courage, if properly led, to pay their honest debts in honest coin.

The working people, the widow and orphans, the poor people of the United States, are going to suffer if this measure shall be enacted. I pray that God may help the people of the United States.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there are two questions which seem to be presented by this joint resolution. One of them is the constitutional question, the other a question of policy.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield while I call a quorum? This is the most important measure we have had before us.

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce the absence of the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] because of illness, he now being confined to his home.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, there are two questions presented by this joint resolution. One is a constitutional question, the other a question of policy.

Our authority to pass the joint resolution has been doubted, particularly outside of this Chamber. It seems to me that the authority within the Constitution for the enactment of such a measure is fairly well established by the decisions of our Supreme Court in construing the Constitution of the United States. The Constitution provides, as we recall, that—

> The Congress shall have power * * * to coin money, regulate the value thereof, and of foreign coin, and fix the standard of weights and measures.

The Supreme Court has construed that provision of the Constitution to mean that the Congress has full and complete and plenary power over the entire subject of money. Originally—and indeed it was so argued during the consideration of the legal tender laws—it was supposed that this clause authorized Congress to deal only with the subject of metal money, but the Supreme Court has clearly established, and the country has accepted for over a half century, the authority of the Congress to control and deal with the entire subject of money, anything from paper to gold.

The power is unlimited, and that power cannot be circumscribed or embarrassed either by previous acts of Congress or by contracts entered into by private parties. The power of Congress over our monetary system is free and full at all times.

If the Congress sees fit to establish a certain monetary system, and if by reason of that act certain rights spring up, in contracts or otherwise nevertheless, it may modify or change or reestablish the monetary system, notwithstanding that the effect of doing so may control or, in a sense, impair obligations theretofore incurred. I am now discussing purely the constitutional question, and not the question of policy, or some would say the moral question.

Congress may deem it wise to establish a certain monetary system today, and it may establish another system in subsequent days, and whatever change takes place in values, in property or in contracts, by reason of the action is change which is inevitable in the exercise of the constitutional power of Congress.

Something has been said this morning to the effect that such action on the part of Congress as is contemplated by this joint resolution would impair the obligation of contracts. As I have said, I am now considering purely the legal question. The Federal Constitution makes no prohibition such as is found in the Constitution with reference to the States.

Assuming, for the sake of the argument, that the effect of the enactment of the joint resolution would be to impair the obligations of the Government, as a legal proposition there is no prohibition on the authority of Congress to exercise that power.

The Supreme Court in the Legal Tender cases (12 Wall. 550), referring to this question, said:

> It is then clear that the powers of Congress may be exerted, though the effect of such exertion may be in one case to annul and in other cases to impair the obligation of contracts. And it is no sufficient answer to this to say it is true only when the powers exerted were expressly granted.
>
> If, then, the Legal Tender Acts were justly chargeable with impairing contract obligations, they would not for that reason be forbidden unless a different rule is to be applied to them from that which has hitherto prevailed in the construction of other powers granted by the fundamental law. But, as already intimated, the objection misapprehends the nature and extent of the contract obligation spoken of in the Constitution. As in a state of civil society property of a citizen or subject is ownership, subject to the lawful demands of the sovereign, so contracts must be understood as made in reference to the possible exercise of the rightful authority of the Government, and no obligation of a contract can extend to the defeat of legitimate Government authority.

Notwithstanding the fact that contracts between private parties had been made, based upon the monetary system which has obtained, notwithstanding the fact that the Government had issued its obligations payable in gold, these contracts and these obligations were taken with the understanding that the power of the Government was such that it could change its monetary system and thereby affect the contracts entered into either by private parties or issued by the Government.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] referred to the fifth amendment to the Constitution with regard to the due-process-of-law clause. That question was also passed upon by the Supreme Court, and it said:

> Closely allied to the objection we have just been considering is the argument pressed upon us that the Legal Tender Acts were prohibited by the spirit of the fifth amendment, which forbids taking private property for public use without just compensation or due process of law. That provision has always been understood as referring only to a direct appropriation, and not to consequential injuries resulting from the exercise of lawful power. It has never been supposed to have any bearing upon, or to inhibit laws that indirectly work harm and loss to individuals. A new tariff, an embargo, a draft, or a war may inevitably bring upon individuals great losses; may, indeed, render valuable property almost valueless. They may destroy the worth of contracts. But whoever supposed that, because of this, a tariff could not be changed, or a nonintercourse act, or an embargo, be enacted, or a war be declared? By the act of June 28, 1834, a new regulation of the weight and value of gold coin was adopted, and about 6 percent was taken from the weight of each dollar. The effect of this was that all creditors were subjected to a corresponding loss. The debts then due became solvable with 6 percent less gold than was required to pay them before. The result was thus precisely what it is contended the Legal Tender Acts worked. But was it ever imagined this was taking private property without compensation or without due process of law? Was the idea ever advanced that the new regulation of gold coin was against the spirit of the fifth amendment? And has anyone in good faith avowed his belief that even a law debasing the current coin, by increasing the alloy, would be taking private property?

Or impairing the obligations of contracts?

I do not think it is necessary, Mr. President, to discuss the constitutional question at length. I merely call attention to those decisions. It is true that at the time those decisions were rendered there was a divided court, but since that time the principles announced by the majority of the court have been accepted by the country, and Congress has accepted them. Even at this session we have acted upon the theory that Congress has the power to control the entire subject of money and thereby indirectly to affect contractual obligations, or, as some would claim, to take property without due process of law.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. LOGAN. If Congress may change the amount of gold in the dollar, and such action is legal as it affects contracts which provide that payment shall be made according to a certain standard of weight and fineness, I should like to ask the Senator from Idaho if Congress might not also pass a law which would change the weight or measure of any commodity that was sold? If a contractor had bought a million bushels of wheat, could Congress then say that 28 pounds should constitute a bushel of wheat, and would that be no impairment of the obligation of a contract, calling the attention of the Senator to the fact that Congress is vested with the power to regulate weights and measures as well as to coin money and fix the value thereof?

Mr. BORAH. I think Congress may establish a system of weights and measures which might be different from the system obtaining at any particular time.

Mr. LOGAN. Does the Senator think that such action would not be the impairment of the obligation of a contract?

Mr. BORAH. If it were the impairment of the obligation of a contract, there is no prohibition in the Constitution of the United States against Congress impairing the obligation of a contract, if Congress in the exercise of its constitutional powers affects the terms of a contract that the citizen undertakes to accept.

Mr. LOGAN. That is very true, but it seems to me, as a matter of general law, that if a man buys a million bushels of wheat when 56 pounds constitute a bushel, if Congress should pass a law reducing the weight of a bushel we could not, by passing such a law, take half the wheat which he has purchased away from that man.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. NORRIS. I am going now to read from the Legal Tender cases (12 Wall. 549), which I think will answer the question of the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. LOGAN].

We have been asked—

Said the Court—

whether Congress can declare that a contract to deliver a quantity of grain may be satisfied by the tender of a less quantity. Undoubtedly not. But this is a false analogy. There is a wide distinction between the tender of quantities, or of specific articles, and a tender of legal values. Contracts for the delivery of specific articles belong exclusively to the domain of State legislation, while contracts for the payment of money are subject to the authority of Congress, at least so far as relates to the means of payment. They are engagements to pay with lawful money of the United States, and Congress is empowered to regulate that money.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I agree that that is sound, and an answer; but where the contract made by the Government or by private individuals specifically provides that it shall be satisfied in gold of a certain weight and fineness, then it follows, I think, under the principle announced in what the Senator from Nebraska has just read, that it becomes a commodity and not a legal value.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. The power of Congress over contracts, not only between the Government and private individuals but between private individuals, is broader than even the question of regulating the value and the quantity of any given metal. It applies likewise to interstate commerce. The Senator may recall the case upon which the Supreme Court passed where a man or his wife, or both of them, were injured by the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, and, as compensation for that injury, the railroad agreed to give to each of them, or both of them, a pass over all its lines for the remainder of their lives. That was stipulated in a written contract. Congress, however, came along and finally passed a law making it unlawful to issue such passes. The parties to the contract, the injured persons, brought suit for specific performance, and the Supreme Court held that such a contract must be subject to the sovereign power of Congress to regulate commerce and therefore could not be enforced.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I simply want to observe that I happen to be very familiar with the case mentioned by my colleague because Colonel Motley was an old friend of mine and resided in my town at the time, and I have always been absolutely satisfied, in my own mind, without the least lingering doubt, that the Supreme Court decided the case wrong.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand the principle with reference to the power of Congress over money, it may exercise that power, and whatever loss or injury results in the exercise of that power is a loss or injury which the citizen must accept. Every person contracts in the light of the power of Congress to change, modify, or wholly reestablish the kind of money which must be accepted as lawful money. If this were not true, the Congress would be shorn of its power through a previous expression of its wisdom on the subject to the utter exclusion of its later wisdom under wholly different circumstances.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I believe the Senator is departing from the point on which I wish to ask him a question. He remarked a moment ago that there was nothing in the Constitution which prohibits Congress from impairing the obligation of a contract. I am not certain that is true. There is an express provision prohibiting the States from impairing the obligation of a contract, which evidences that, in the conscience of those framing the Constitution, the impairment of the obligation of a contract was not a desirable power to be vested in a State government, either because they thought the impairment of such an obligation was a breach of faith or was an unsound policy. That language is not in the Constitution as related to Congress, and cannot be, in those express terms, because the Constitution in the bankruptcy clause vests Congress in express terms with the power to impair the obligation of a contract, and it prescribes the way in which Congress shall exercise that power through the enactment of a uniform rule of bankruptcy.

Bankruptcy presupposes that the debtor shall surrender his property to his creditor in liquidation of his debt. There is a rule that the expression of one thing is the exclusion of another. Congress can impair the obligation of a contract; there is not any doubt about it; it can make such an impairment through the enactment of a bankruptcy law. I think that reinforces the conclusion that it cannot do so in any other wise.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I do not think, as a legal proposition based upon the decisions of the Supreme Court, that there is any doubt at all that the principle invoked with reference to the impairment of the obligation of contracts does not obtain with reference to the National Government, in dealing with the question of money.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BORAH. I will yield in just a moment. The National Government, in the exercise of its sovereign power, such as the coinage of money and regulating the value thereof, cannot be restrained by contractual relations. It would not be contended for a moment, I presume, that by reason of contracts, either of the Government under the authority of Congress or between private parties, there could be impaired, embarrassed, circumscribed, or limited the sovereign power of the Government to coin money and regulate the value thereof.

I now yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, does the Senator contend that it is competent for the Congress to declare that 12.9 grains of gold constitute 25.8 grains of gold?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not contend that, but I contend that Congress may declare that a dollar with 12.9 grains must be accepted in payment of a dollar of 25.8 grains. It may fix the value of the dollar, the value of money.

Mr. GLASS. Is not that the contention, in the last analysis? When a contract requires the Government to pay the holder of its obligation 25.8 grains, is it competent for Congress to say that the Government shall pay him 12.9 grains?

Mr. BORAH. I contend when an individual takes an obligation payable in gold, specified as suggested by the Senator, that he takes it with the full understanding that the Government may change its monetary policy at any time and that he must accept whatever the Congress says at a particular time shall constitute money. I am not discussing now a commodity contract; I am discussing a contract to pay dollars.

Mr. GLASS. I submit that it does not relate to the monetary policy of the Government at all. The contract does not say that the Government shall pay so many dollars. It says the Government shall pay so many grains of gold, to wit, 25.8 grains. Is it competent for Congress to say that contract is fairly met if the Government says it will pay only 12.9 grains; The contracts provide that the Government shall pay so much money of a certain weight and fineness.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; but it is money. It is dollars to be paid, although the dollars are supposed to be so much gold, but it is dollars.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; but it is money of a certain weight and fineness.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; but if the Government sees fit to change the weight and fineness and still make it money, the individual must accept the money of the weight and fineness fixed.

Mr. GLASS. In other words, the Senator contends that the Government can legitimately declare that 2 ounces make a pound?

Mr. BORAH. No; I do not declare anything of that kind. I contend the Congress may fix the value of the dollar as to its gold content. I declare that when the Government says it will pay a certain number of dollars, and designates those dollars of a certain weight and fineness, it may thereafter exercise its power to name what the dollar shall be and to say that the dollar shall be of a different weight and fineness, and the individual must accept that dollar. That is what was decided by the court of last resort in England only a few days ago. I am not to be confused by treating these contracts as contracts to deliver a commodity; they are contracts to pay money, and Congress may control them, because they are contracts to pay money.

Mr. WHEELER and Mr. BARKLEY addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield; and if so, to whom?

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Montana, who, I think, rose first.

Mr. WHEELER. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Idaho to the fact that by the acts of February 7, 1862, July 11, 1862, March 3, 1863, March 3, 1864, June 3, 1864, March 3, 1865, and March 18, 1869, all Government bonds were payable in coin, meaning both silver and gold. Then the Congress of the United States demonetized silver and thereafter those bonds were payable only in gold.

If the price of silver had been higher than the price of gold, we would have had exactly the same situation, because of the fact that the Congress would in effect have repudiated a former contract. It was said by Daniel Webster that the demonetization of silver was unconstitutional because of the fact that the bonds had been payable in coin of the United States, but the Supreme Court did not take that view of it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Is it not true that the Supreme Court of the United States has held that the United States Government cannot make a contract with any person that operates to deprive it or divest it of its sovereign power to deal with the subject?

Mr. BORAH. The Government cannot contract away its sovereignty. Neither can it legislate away its sovereignty. If it legislates this year touching the subject of money, it may exercise it differently another year, and any legislation theretofore obtaining would not be controlling as to subsequent legislation. It may repeal or modify statutes touching the money question the same as it may repeal other laws.

Mr. BARKLEY. But if the Government, either by legislation or by contract which is the result of legislation or made in pursuance of legislation, entered into a contract with reference to the weight and fineness or value of any money, either metallic or other kind, which would deprive it of its right to deal with it in the future, that would be in effect a surrender of its sovereignty.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. If I may be permitted, whatever the Supreme Court has decided, if my neighbor agrees to pay me 10 bushels of wheat for a consideration given, and at an appointed time, notwithstanding his ability to do otherwise, he paid me only 5 bushels of wheat, I would regard him as a thief and would never make another contract with him.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator is now discussing the moral question or the question of policy, which I said a few moments ago I was not discussing while discussing the legal question. He is also confusing a contract to deliver a commodity with a contract to pay money. What I contend is that it is impossible for Congress to commit itself against the future exercise of its power to coin money and regulate the value thereof in any way that it sees fit. It could not issue bonds and by the issuing of bonds commit itself to certain policies for all time to come and deprive itself of the exercise of its judgment in a different emergency and under different circumstances. What it should do as a matter of policy is another thing, but what it may do as a matter of law there can be little doubt.

Mr. GLASS. As I said to the Senator, I am not contesting the point that the Senate can exercise its constitutional right to coin and fix the value of money. I do not think that is involved. I think what is involved is that the Government has agreed with the holders of its bonds to pay them 28.8 grains of gold of existing fineness, and if it pays them any less than that it is repudiation.

Mr. BORAH. That comes back to the question of policy which I am going to discuss in a few moments.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. GORE. A moment ago I failed to make this point which I rose to make. The Senator said there is nothing in the Constitution which prohibits Congress from impairing the obligation of contract. Those of us who think Congress has not that power are not called upon to show the prohibition of such power in the Constitution. It devolves upon those who assert the power to cite the section and clause in the Constitution which grants the power to Congress for the Government to violate its contract.

I have always felt that the fifth amendment, which prohibits the taking of property without due process of law and without just compensation, applies in this instance, and I put this question to the Senator: He owns a horse worth $100. Can the Government of the United States confiscate or commandeer that horse without paying the Senator just compensation?

Mr. BORAH. That, in my judgment, has no relevancy to the subject which we are now discussing. We are discussing contracts to pay money, to pay dollars, and Congress may compel a person to accept a dollar of a different gold content in satisfaction of a dollar of a certain gold content. A dollar is a dollar under the decree of the Government, whether it has one gold content or another. Let us keep away from commodity contracts. They throw no light on the issue here.

Mr. GORE. Suppose the Senator sells me the horse for $100 and takes my note for $100; can the Congress enact a law to confiscate that note and take the value of the Senator's horse away from him without any compensation?

Mr. BORAH. No; the Congress cannot enact a law to confiscate the note, but the Congress could enact a law changing its monetary system which might result in reducing the value of the note. Undoubtedly it could do that.

Mr. GORE. That brings me to this point, and then I shall not disturb the Senator further. A bond of the United States is the promise of the Government to pay a fixed sum of money at a fixed date in the future with interest. A Treasury note is the promise of the Government to pay, not at a fixed time. Sometimes that promise is to pay on demand and sometimes that promise is to pay bearer. We have just enacted a law authorizing the Government of the United States to liquidate its interest-bearing bonds payable in gold with Treasury notes payable to bearer.

A Government bond is nothing but the Government's promise to pay in the future with interest. A Treasury note is nothing but the Government's promise to pay either on demand or to bearer. When we authorized the Government to pay its bonds with Treasury notes, we authorized the Government to discharge one promise to pay, bearing interest payable in gold, with another promise to pay not bearing interest and not payable in gold.

Does the Senator think that it is good faith for the Government to pay off one promise to pay, bearing interest payable in gold, with another promise to pay which does not bear interest and is not redeemable in gold?

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, that raises the question of policy which I am going to discuss later.

Mr. GORE. I have a quotation from Charles Sumner debating this very point in 1868, in which he referred to repudiation, which I shall not do. I shall ask later to have it inserted in the RECORD. I do not wish to disturb the Senator for that purpose at this time.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BYRD in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. Before the Senator leaves the constitutional question, is not this the situation? That Congress, exercising the power of the Congress, is not expressly restrained from violating a contract; that the coinage of money and the fixing of the weight and value of it is one thing, is a power that cannot be impaired and cannot be contracted away, cannot be limited, cannot be whittled down in any sort of imaginable process, but that the protection of a valid contract is an altogether different question.

The only inhibition that the Supreme Court has ever been able to find under our Constitution on the power of the Federal Government to violate a contract is found in the fact that a valid contract is property, and property cannot be taken without due process of law and without paying for it. But that is one question, the protection of a contract, and the exercise of the sovereign power to coin money and to fix its value is altogether a different question.

Mr. BORAH. Certainly.

Mr. GEORGE. One is absolutely sovereign and the other is very closely related to municipal laws.

I have no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that the Congress may fix the weight and fineness of the gold content or of the silver content as to value, which will, of course, control all contracts then in existence as well as contracts thereafter made. So long as those contracts merely call for the payment of money, when the Congress has declared a certain thing to be legal tender, that legal tender is tenderable in discharge of the debt. I have no question that as between individuals who have undertaken to prescribe by contract terms the payment of a specific kind of money of a specific value, the Congress may nevertheless declare a different thing to be legal tender, and that such a declaration of Congress should be binding as between the parties.

There is a serious question in my mind on this phase of the matter and this phase only. For instance, at the time when the Government issues its bonds or obligations it has exercised its sovereign power. It has provided for the coinage of money and has fixed the weight and value thereof. In precisely the terms of that money, weight and value thereof as fixed by the Congress, under that valid act of Congress, the Government contracts to pay a certain number of dollars of that specific kind and description. The question is not whether the Congress may not exercise its constitutional power to coin money and fix the value thereof different both as to quantity and fineness, but the question is whether that contract itself comes within the protection of the principle which our Supreme Court has recognized. That is to me the only question that arises out of the pending joint resolution, and the only close question on the naked matter of law or constitutionality. Of course, the question of policy and of morality I am not discussing.

I take this view of the matter: In that I may be wrong, but I want to ask the Senator, with this long preliminary statement, whether this is his view:

That a contract calling for gold of the present weight and fineness is, after all, a contract calling for the payment of money; and the descriptive terms entering into that contract are, after all, to be tested by the cardinal principles by which all contracts are tested, to wit, the intent and meaning of the parties to the contract.

If the contract is dischargeable in money, although the contracting parties go further and undertake to describe specifically the kind of money, it is nevertheless a contract calling for a money payment. If it is, it falls clearly within the control of the Congress itself, which, in the exercise of its sovereign power, may from time to time, from day to day, vary the content of the money or legal tender.

That I understand to be the effect of the English case to which the Senator referred. Without having read the case closely, it seems to me that the English court said that although the contracting parties had undertaken to define precisely the kind of money so far as its quality and quantity were concerned, nevertheless it was a contract dischargeable in money. I go further in my own reasoning—that the courts would always be disposed and must always be disposed to regard a contract so written as one dischargeable in money, because to give it any other effect is to tend, at least, to limit and to restrict the exercise of the sovereign power placed in the Government—in the Congress, in this instance—to coin its money and fix its value.

I think, if I understand the Senator, that our views are perhaps very similar upon the legal phase of the question.

Mr. BORAH. I agree entirely with the Senator, if I understand his conclusions.

In other words, when the Government agrees to pay a $1,000 bond, it agrees to pay a thousand dollars, and then it defines the dollar of a certain weight and fineness of gold. But it is an agreement to pay money; and the Government may change the content of the money, and the bondholder must accept what the Government designates as money, although it may be of a different weight and fineness. That is precisely what the English decision decided.

I did not intend to take up the time on that phase of the matter, however.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, it would seem to me that the Government would not have any right to enter into a commodity contract of that kind under the law.

Mr. BORAH. It does not assume to enter into a commodity contract. It does not assume to pay a certain amount of bullion. It agrees to pay so much money, and defines what the dollar is, and so forth; but it does not agree to deliver so much bullion. It is not a bullion contract and is not so regarded. It is a negotiable instrument. The dollar sign is printed all over it.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. Suppose a great house such as Tiffany, engaged in the manufacture of various articles composed partially or altogether of gold, such as gold plate and gold trinkets and gold watches, with large values, had a contract with the United States to pay them, in return for the surrender of their bonds, so many gold dollars of 25.8 grains, desiring the gold for use in their manufacturing establishment. Would it not be virtual confiscation of their property to pay them in gold of one half that value?

Mr. BORAH. If Tiffany & Co. had an agreement from the Government of the United States to pay so many dollars of a certain weight and fineness of gold, undoubtedly the Government could treat that as money; and in its future legislation, if it changed the value of the money, they would have to accept the value as determined by the Government.

Mr. GLASS. In other words, then, they would have confiscated the property of the contracting party.

Mr. BORAH. That very question came up in the Legal Tender cases, and the Supreme Court held that it was not a confiscation.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, yes; I know there are differences of opinion; and the Supreme Court was packed in order to get that decision in the Legal Tender cases.

Mr. BORAH. I disagree very strongly with the view of the Senator that the Supreme Court was packed; and that contention has been answered so completely and so fully that I do not think it can be justly charged at this time. That was a charge born of the fierce politics of the day, but time has proven it to be false.

Mr. GLASS. It was so completely believed that the man who was put on the court to render the decision went down in history as infamous.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I call the Senator's attention to the fact that in the case of Julliard against Greenman, reported in One Hundred and Tenth United States Reports, page 421, decided March 3, 1884—1884, not in war time——

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I have that case here.

Mr. FLETCHER. In that case the court upheld the exercise of the same power as in the Legal Tender cases, and said:

> The power of making the notes of the United States a legal tender in payment of private debts, being included in the power to borrow money and to provide a national currency, is not defeated or restricted by the fact that its exercise may affect the value of private contracts. * * * The question whether at any particular time, in war or in peace, the exigency is such, by reason of unusual and pressing demands on the resources of the Government——

And that is the condition now. There is an exigency, and there is an emergency, and there are unusual pressure and demand upon the Government—> that it is, as a matter of fact, wise and expedient to resort to this means, is a political question, to be determined by Congress when the question or exigency arises, and not a judicial question, to be afterward passed upon by the courts.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I am fairly familiar with that decision.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, one commentator upon the case——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMPSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BORAH. I will yield to the Senator from Oklahoma for a question.

Mr. GORE. I desired to make an observation on the case just referred to by the Senator from Florida. It will take only a moment.

Mr. BORAH. Very well.

Mr. GORE. One commentator on the case just cited by the Senator from Florida used these words—that it approaches perilously near to the doctrine of inherent sovereignty; the point being that the United States, under that decision, has certain inherent powers of sovereignty not derived from the Constitution of the United States. That shipwrecks the whole theory upon which our institutions are founded——

Mr. BORAH. I do not rely upon the doctrine of inherent sovereignty.

Mr. GORE. One moment; which is that the Government of the United States is one of limited powers and not of unlimited powers.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; and that is what I am discussing. I am not asserting the existence of kingly powers or monarchial powers. I am relying upon the express terms of the Constitution of the United States, which gives Congress, without limit or embarrassment or being circumscribed in any way, the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof. It may do that as often as the exigency seems to demand it; and the fact that it does it today in one way, and establishes one weight and fineness today, and establishes another a year from now, does not in the slightest degree impair the power of the Government to do that thing.

Now, Mr. President, I want to say just a word about a matter which the able Senator from Virginia referred to awhile ago when he said that the Supreme Court was packed when it made the decision in the Legal Tender cases.

That proposition has been answered so fully and so completely that it seems to me unnecessary to go into it; but I may say that if the court at that time rendered a decision which seemed to be doubtful in the minds of many people, it is no longer a matter of doubt. Long afterward, and after all the conditions and the passions and the excitement of the war were over, the Supreme Court of the United States took up the case again, and, in time of peace, held that it was within the power of the Government of the United States to make paper money a legal tender for the payment of debts contracted either prior to the time the act was passed or after the act was passed. The Legal Tender cases are no longer questioned, and the old political libel about a packed court cannot be revived at this time to throw doubt upon a decision, the principles of which have been accepted in legislation for more than half a century.

Mr. President, I desire to refer for just a minute to the English case, which seems to me to be pertinent in view of the discussion which has just taken place.

The facts of that case were as follows:

> The plaintiff, a holder of one of the defendant's bonds, sought a declaration of his rights under the payment provisions of the bond providing that—
> The company * * * will * * * pay to the bearer * * * in London, England, * * * the sum of £100 in sterling or gold coin of the United Kingdom of or equal to the standard of weight and fineness existing on the 1st day of September 1928.

That was the agreement—that they would pay so much sterling, so many pounds of sterling, of a certain description, as follows:

> * * * in sterling or gold coin of the United Kingdom of or equal to the standard of weight and fineness existing on the 1st day of September 1928.

Both courts—the court to which the matter was first taken and the court of appeals—decided that the party must accept the sterling, which was then about 30 percent below the value at the time the contract was made. Why? Because while the contract designated a certain description of the sterling, of a certain amount of gold, nevertheless they held that it was in fact a contract for the payment of money, and that the question of money was under the control of Parliament.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I wish to ask the Senator a question.

The theory of the British constitution is that Parliament is omnipotent. The commentators go so far as to say that Parliament could constitute a man judge in his own case, that seeming to be the extreme doctrine. Does the Senator think that a case rendered under such a constitution would be a precedent under a constitution where the fathers of this Republic were afraid that some day some Congress might undertake to deprive a man of his property without due process of law, and forbade that act?

Mr. BORAH. The Parliament of England has no more control over the money question than the Congress of the United States under the grant given in the Constitution. There is no limitation upon the power of Congress. It is not circumscribed in any respect whatever. It is given full and plenary power to deal with that subject; and therefore it is the same as if there were no Constitution whatever, as the Senator indicates in the case of England.

Mr. GORE. For the sake of the argument, and only for the sake of the argument, I think possibly that might be considered as true with respect to future contracts. I think a different point of morals and law and constitutional provisions would relate to past contracts.

Mr. BORAH. This was a past contract, however, upon which the court was passing.

Mr. GORE. Oh, in England; yes. It would not make any difference there.

Mr. BORAH. With reference to the English case, I read the following:

> Only after some hesitation did the learned justice confess that he was swayed to the belief that the principal money secured by the bond was the definite sum of £100 sterling.
>
> "And not an uncertain amount, to be ascertained on the day of payment by adding to the sum therein specified a further amount of sterling in the event of a decrease in the gold value of that specified sum." * * *
>
> Lord Justice Lawrence argued that the gold clause—
> "does not and cannot * * * prevent bank notes, which under the acts of 1833 and 1928 are made legal tender, from being legal tender. The plaintiff, under the express terms of those acts, is legally bound to accept bank notes in payment of the moneys secured by the bond, and upon such payment the indebtedness of the company under the bond would be discharged and the obligation thereunder extinguished. * * * A contract that a debt shall be discharged by payment in gold coins (being one form of legal tender) cannot abrogate the enactment by the legislature that the debt may be discharged by the payment of bank notes (being another form of legal tender)."

That seems to me to be directly in point upon this proposition. However, I have spent more time than I desired to spend upon the legal question.

Mr. President, the question of policy is a far more difficult proposition. It is a matter which certainly gives wide range for a difference of opinion. It is a matter which justifies legitimate debate and serious consideration upon the part of this body. I do not think anyone can claim that it is free from difficulty. I do not think anyone can claim that the course which is indicated by this joint resolution is one which is free from doubt. In other words, there are two sides to this proposition on the question of policy.

Changing the monetary system of a country is a serious matter at any time, and under any circumstances. It necessarily results in injury to some of the people. It necessarily results in property disadvantage to some of the people. It has that effect inevitably; and the question which we are called upon to determine in determining our vote, as I see it, is whether the policy to be adopted is in the interest of the people as a whole, even though it may work to the property disadvantage of a portion of the citizenship.

I read a paragraph from Senator Fessenden which seems to me to express the matter I am attempting to express far better than I can state it. He was Chairman of the Committee on Finance at the time the legal tender laws came before Congress for consideration. He was afterward Secretary of the Treasury. He said upon the floor of the Senate:

Say what you will, nobody can deny that it is bad faith. If it be necessary for the salvation of the Government, all considerations of this kind must yield; but to make the best of it, it is bad faith, and encourages bad morality, both in public and private. Going to the extent that it does, to say that notes thus issued shall be receivable in payment of all private obligations, however contracted, is in its very essence a wrong, for it compels one man to take from his neighbor, in payment of a debt, that which he would not otherwise receive or be obliged to receive, and what is probably not full payment. It is a contribution which every man is bound to make under the circumstances. We can take all the property of any citizen. That is what is called a forced contribution. * * * The question after all returns: Is this measure absolutely indispensable to procure means? If so, as I said before, necessity knows no law.

There can be no justification for this policy, Mr. President, in my judgment, except in the great necessity of the national situation. As I see it, our Government is not making a situation—it is meeting a situation. Our Government is not making a condition—it is meeting a condition. We are not hastening to change our monetary system. We are doing so after 3 years of painful experience which has cost our people millions.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. REED. What would the Senator say of the good faith or bad faith of this very same Government's issuing promises on April 23 of this year? The emergency was as great then as it is now, or greater.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, let me say, since the Senator has asked that question, that in May a year ago in discussing this question I indicated upon the floor of the Senate, and quoted a number of authorities to the effect, that we would inevitably be forced off the gold standard; that if we could not find some means other than through the monetary system of raising prices of commodities and lifting the masses of the people out of their then condition of distress, in order to protect ourselves against the cheap-currency countries of the world we would be compelled to go off the gold standard. There has never been a time in the last year and a half when I could see any escape from the United States abandoning the gold standard. I said then that the gold dollar was no longer an honest dollar; that its constant appreciation was burying many of our people under debt and augmenting the values of the creditor.

What was in the minds of those who issued the notes upon the 23d day of April I do not know. If they issued them understanding that the conditions were such that at this time we would be stepping off the gold standard, it cannot be defended in morals, it cannot be justified. But if events since then have compelled them to take this course that exempts them from criticism.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Referring to the question asked by the Senator from Pennsylvania with reference to the issue of certain obligations on the 23d day of April carrying the gold clause, the Senator from Pennsylvania, I am sure, knows that under the law as it then existed, and as it now exists, those bonds had to be issued in that form under the law. If we were to issue similar obligations tomorrow, or next week, they would have to carry that clause, which is the basis of this legislation. So that there is no question of morality or bad faith connected with the April 23d transaction any more than would be connected with any other transaction, and as long as there are outstanding obligations of the United States carrying the gold clause, there never can be a repeal of the law under which they were issued without somebody raising the question that we are undertaking to repudiate past obligations.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, let us go further into the discussion of the situation as it presents itself at this time, because I am frank to say that the idea of a government not complying with its contract is a very distasteful proposition to me.

At the present time some 36 nations of the world are off the gold standard. The gold standard was adopted primarily because of the great value of gold as an international medium of exchange. It is no longer such. The world is today off the gold standard. That has resulted in great loss to the people of the United States for the last year and a half or 2 years. We have lost in trade, we have fallen in commerce, by reason of our effort to maintain the gold standard in a world which was upon a managed currency basis.

Mr. President, it is a question with me, and has been from the beginning, as to how long the United States could make a successful fight for the gold standard, single and alone, practically, with the exception of France, without bankrupting its people. It is said that we might continue to fight, and in time we might escape from the dilemma in which we now find ourselves; but in the meantime what would be the effect upon the masses of the people of the United States if we are to compare our stand in its future effect with the effect it has had for the last year and a half?

It is true that men who hold gold contracts will lose something when this legislation is enacted, according to the terms of the contracts. It is said that there are $100,000,000,000 of obligations in which is found the gold clause. If that is true, then under present conditions the people would have to pay $150,000,000,000 in order to satisfy the $100,000,000,000 of debts. The appreciation of gold cannot be ignored in adjusting the equities of this situation. In other words, somebody in this fight for the gold standard must suffer, and suffer extremely.

The masses of the people of the United States have suffered intolerably, homes have been lost, farms have been lost, families have been scattered by reason of the constant fall of commodity prices, and it devolves upon the Government of the United States to find an escape from the present condition of affairs in some way or other. Our people have suffered, and much of that suffering, much of the sacrifice made, has been due to the appreciation of the dollar. How long can we continue such a course? And why should we continue? After all, while you may say contracts are sacred, supreme over contracts, supreme over any particular money system is the welfare of the people as a whole.

It is true that we have had some evidences of a return of prosperity. But let us not deceive ourselves. There is little evidence of any permanent return of prosperity. Until we find a means by which we can restore to the great masses of the people the purchasing power which has been sacrificed, there will be no real permanent return of prosperity. I do not know how that is to be accomplished, with the entire world upon a managed-currency basis, and the United States upon a gold-standard basis.

What chance is there for a change? What chance is there that these nations upon a managed-currency basis are going to change their policy? To my mind, there is practically no chance. If we are to judge Great Britain's policy by the announcement which she has made, through her leading statesmen, she does not propose to surrender the advantage which she has by reason of the fact that she is now at the head of a group of managed-currency nations. It has been of stupendous advantage to Great Britain. I can well understand why, as Mr. Chamberlain says, they have no intention of going back to the former gold standard.

If they are not going back to the gold standard, how long can we continue the fight for the maintenance of the gold standard? They are taking our trade; they are taking our commerce; they are invading the home market by reason of the advantage which it gives them.

The question which is presented to me is, Shall we consider the interests of the great masses of the American people and establish a policy which has some assurance of more or less strength and return to the American people some degree of their purchasing power?

It has been said by the able Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], and has been said by the able Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], that this would be repudiation. I am not prepared to controvert that fact. When the Government of the United States says that it will pay a certain amount in gold, and prepares to pay in a different currency, I am not prepared to controvert the proposition that that is repudiation. According to the terms of the bond, we are not complying with the obligations. The bondholders may well say, in the language of the immortal bard:

> 'Tis mine and I will have it.
> If you deny me, fie upon your law!
> There is no force in the decrees of Venice.
> I stand for judgment:
> Answer; shall I have it?

It was also said, however, in the same great play:

> This bond doth give thee here no jot of blood.

While the bondholder technically has a right to claim the obligation according to its terms, the bondholder must take his position with the rest of the American people in the sacrifice which we are making and have made for the last year and a half or two years. If he collects the normal amount in the bond, then he gets more than the debtor contracted to pay. This appreciation of the dollar is outside the bond—it is the jot of blood. The situation cannot be remedied without someone suffering a loss. The bondholder must share with the others a part of that loss.

I can see no escape from our present awful condition without a change in our monetary system. I have not wanted to see the gold standard abandoned. I believe that if we had had the courage to deal with the silver question in an effective way, we might, by buttressing the gold standard with an additional supply of metal money, have maintained the gold standard. I think it would have been helpful, at least.

On the other hand, if we had seen fit to issue the amount of Treasury notes provided for in the Thomas amendment, I think we might surely have maintained the gold standard, although it would undoubtedly to some extent have decreased the value of the dollar, but not, in my judgment, materially or substantially. But in some way or other we must cease to pay tribute to the gold standard at the expense of the average citizen of the United States. In my opinion, that is what this joint resolution foreshadows as the policy of the Government, and for that reason I support it.

The able Senator from Pennsylvania has offered an amendment. I thought of that amendment myself after I read the report of the hearings. Suppose, however, we struck out the words "or heretofore." That would leave the obligations now in existence payable in gold, and that certainly would accentuate and increase the value of those obligations beyond anything that was contemplated at the time they were issued.

It would be adding a vast amount of value to the obligations, and it does not seem to me that that would be a fair thing to do. Now, Mr. President, I concede that there is some harshness here. But we are dealing with a great national emergency. I would not legislate against the bondholder, but I would legislate in the interests of the Nation as a whole. If in doing so some detriment flows to the bondholder, then I say, "The Sabbath was made for man, not man for the Sabbath"; the bondholder was made for the country, not the country for the bondholder.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I hesitate, after we have listened to the very able argument of the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], to attempt to add anything further to this discussion, but there are certain observations which I wish to make with reference to this proposed legislation in order that my own views upon it, both as to its legality and its morality, may become matters of record.

Much has been said here today with reference to the question of morality involved in the passage of a law by Congress authorizing or resulting in the repudiation of a contract, while the Constitution itself prohibits States from enacting similar legislation. I think, in order that we may understand that distinction, we must take ourselves back to the days when the Constitution was framed and realize what was in progress at that time among the Original Thirteen States.

It will be recalled that for nearly 8 years after the Revolutionary War had ended, and after the treaty of peace had been negotiated and agreed to, there was no government in the United States really worthy of the name. The very States themselves, which had been united in the war for freedom, began to fall apart with jealousies and envy, each one undertaking to erect around itself artificial barriers that would retard the progress of commerce and trade and even the recognition of the obligation of contracts on the part of citizens of the various States. The State of Virginia and the State of Maryland had a quarrel—a very serious quarrel—over the navigation of the Potomac River. The Legislature of New York passed an act prohibiting the importation of firewood from Connecticut into New York, and likewise prohibiting the importation of vegetables grown in Maryland and Virginia. When the Constitutional Convention met in Philadelphia, as the result of the conference held in Annapolis between Virginia and Maryland, and they were setting about to write a fundamental law of this land, setting up a nation, they were confronted with the question whether they would allow the various States, in the exercise of their sovereignty, to carry into legislation the envies and the jealousies which had grown up among them since the Revolution had been concluded.

It was for that reason that the commerce clause was written into the Constitution, providing that Congress, and Congress alone, should have the power to regulate commerce among the States and with foreign countries. Under the exercise of that power Congress could pass a law that would result in the nullification and the impairment of contracts between citizens of two or more States. If a citizen of the State of Pennsylvania should enter into a contract with a citizen of the State of Kentucky to ship in on a given date a certain commodity produced in Pennsylvania, Congress might thereafter enact a law that would prohibit the shipment of that particular article in interstate commerce, thereby nullifying the contract entered into between the citizen of Kentucky and the citizen of Pennsylvania. In the exercise of the power of taxation Congress can nullify contracts between citizens of the United States and the citizens of foreign countries, for any manufacturer in England or France or elsewhere in the world might enter into a contract to provide on a certain day for a certain price a given commodity produced in his country, such commodity to be shipped to the United States, and before its fulfillment Congress might, in the exercise of its taxing power, levy a duty upon that article so high as to make it impossible for it to be brought in, or might even provide an embargo making unlawful the shipment of that particular commodity into the United States, the result of which would be not only the impairment but the nullification of a contract between a citizen of the United States and a citizen of a foreign country. Thus, Mr. President, the power was given to Congress in order that the various States, in the exercise of their power, having, as they had then, developed a spirit of envy and jealousy among themselves, might not enact legislation not only to nullify contracts between citizens of the State but to nullify contracts between citizens of the State and citizens of other States.

It has not been contended that Congress did not have the power, in the exercise of a reasonable degree of its authority, to pass legislation that would result—whether it was designed to do so or not—in the nullification and impairment of contracts. The States cannot pass bankruptcy laws; Congress has sole jurisdiction to enact bankruptcy laws applying to all the citizens of the United States; and in all such laws, from the very beginning until this moment, the question of the impairment or nullification of the obligation of contracts has always been uppermost. It is the very object of the bankruptcy law to permit citizens of States to go into court and provide for the discharge of their debts without the payment of a single dime, which, of course, not only impairs but nullifies the obligations of contracts.

Therefore I do not regard it as a question of morality or of immorality attaching to the Government of the United States because Congress, in the exercise of its supreme power, conferred upon it by the Constitution, has enacted from time to time legislation not designed to nullify contracts, not designed to impair the obligation of contracts, but, in the interest of the public and in pursuance of a sound public policy, has enacted legislation the result of which has been to impair and nullify contracts between citizens of the same State and citizens of different States of the Union.

It may be said that there ought to be a different standard set up by Congress or applied by Congress in its attitude toward private contracts between citizens and its attitude toward contracts of its own. I may be obtuse on that subject; my moral perceptibility may not be as keen as that of some others; but I do not see why there is any question of morality involved in the exercise of a supreme authority by the Government of the United States in the interest of all the people living in a republic under whose theory, at least, the welfare of all the people must be supreme to that of any one person. It is under that authority that we may declare war, and in the pursuance of that policy take the lives of our citizens, on the ground that the welfare of 120,000,000 people is supreme and superior to the welfare of any number of people who make up the 120,000,000. Therefore, in the exercise of our sovereign power, in the interest of our people, in order that our democracy, our theory of government, our principles, and our civilization may be preserved, we can destroy the lives of millions of our people on the theory that the good of all the people requires the sacrifice of some of them in the exercise of the policies of government.

Not only have we the power to do that, but in the exercise of the exclusive power conferred upon Congress to coin money and regulate the value thereof, the same principle is involved. I do not understand the word "coin" merely to mean the melting of gold or silver or copper into a liquid and then its coinage into money with the imprimatur of the United States Government printed upon it. The word "coin" there means not only to coin by melting the metal and converting it into dollars or half dollars or eagles or half eagles or nickels or dimes or pennies, money made of metal, but it means likewise the issuance of other kinds of money by the Government of the United States. The word "coin" means not only to coin in its narrow and restricted sense, but it means the power to issue; and it is under that power and under the definition of the word "coin" that all our paper money is in circulation today. Every greenback, every national-bank note, every Federal Reserve note, every gold certificate, every silver certificate, now in circulation under the authority of the United States has been issued under this constitutional power to coin money and regulate the value thereof. It means, of course, to print or to issue; there is no other authority to issue money in the Constitution except under the particular section to which I am referring.

Mr. President, as to the question of the Government's contract or of any contract, to which the Senator from Pennsylvania has adverted, and which has been so ably discussed by the Senator from Idaho, let me say that these bonds, these obligations, carrying with them what is called "the gold clause", providing that they shall be paid in gold of the value and fineness that existed on a certain date prior, in one case, to 1910, and in another case, I believe, prior to 1900. If it be admitted—and it must be—that Congress can change that contract without involving the question of morality or legality by a change in the content of that dollar, it likewise has the power, it has the right, to change it as to payment in specie. In other words, if Congress has the power, which it does have, to say that, notwithstanding all these contracts that are outstanding, notwithstanding the fact that when those contracts were entered into the content of the gold dollar was 25.8 grains, Congress may tomorrow provide that the gold dollar shall contain 20 grains or 15 grains, thereby changing to that extent that contract.

Nobody denies that Congress can enact such legislation, for if it could not do it, its hands would always be tied; it would always be in a strait-jacket. So long as there was a single bond outstanding in the hands of any citizen carrying this obligation to pay in gold of a certain particular degree of fineness and value we never could escape from that strait-jacket until all our obligations were discharged and the United States Government occupied the anomalous and unusual position of owing nobody anything by reason of its obligations in writing. If the contention of the Senator from Pennsylvania and other Senators is to hold that so long as there is an outstanding obligation carrying the gold clause providing for payment in gold of a certain fineness and value, then we never can escape from that, and Congress and the Government would be utterly powerless to change it until we had by some miracle discharged all the debts that the Government of the United States owes, started over, after wiping the slate clean, and provided that in the future all bonds shall be payable not in gold but in legal tender.

By the way, we have in the act of May 12, as I recall, known as the "Agricultural Relief Act", which is a combination of several acts, definitely entered upon the policy of making all money of the United States, of whatever material it is made, whether gold, silver, copper, or paper, of equal value in the payment of all debts, public and private. Therefore, under the law enacted within less than a month, any obligation of the United States, or any obligation of any private citizen, may be paid in any money that is now outstanding under the power of Congress to coin and issue money under the Constitution.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an inquiry?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. I wonder if the Senator would be good enough to explain why in this joint resolution that is now pending, currency is excluded. The term "obligations" is used and the right to enforce the gold clause in an obligation is forbidden. I am asking the Senator for an explanation as to why currency should be excluded because, as I understand, our currency is payable in gold; and if our bonds are payable in currency, there is a chance, then, that currency may find its way back, seeking redemption in gold, and we are up against practical repudiation on the one side and against legal repudiation on the other.

Mr. BARKLEY. As a matter of fact, the Senator knows that the currency is redeemable in gold. Anybody who has one of the bonds of the United States Government and is paid in currency under this joint resolution, if it shall be enacted, may take that currency and have it redeemed in gold, when the restrictions are lifted, if and when they are lifted, with reference to payment now of gold in discharge of the obligations of the United States which have been brought about by recent proclamation of the President operating under legislation passed at this session of Congress.

Mr. ADAMS. Then we are only going part way off the gold standard?

Mr. BARKLEY. As a matter of fact, we are not going off the gold standard except insofar as we have prohibited the exportation of gold and except insofar as we have restricted payments in gold for the time being. The law has not been repealed which says that gold shall be the standard of value in the United States. Even if the President should exercise this power to reduce the gold content of the dollar from 25.8 grains to 20 grains, the gold dollar would still be the standard of value in the United States. So we are not really legally off the gold standard except insofar as we have suspended gold payments. Gold is still the standard of value in this country. There may be a difference insofar as foreign countries are concerned, but so far as the people of the United States are concerned the sole standard of all our values will be gold until the Congress repeals that law, no matter how much the gold content may be reduced by proclamation of the President.

Mr. ADAMS. That is, the term "gold standard" has two meanings, one a standard of measurement like we use the yard for measuring cloth, and the other is that we are off the gold standard in that we are not paying out gold.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is correct. We are only in a very partial and superficial sense off the gold standard. So long as we do not pay our obligations in gold, so long as we prohibit the shipment of gold to foreign countries, to that extent we are off the gold standard; but if this should continue for 40 years, gold would still be the standard of value in the United States of America.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. I will have to disagree with the Senator that we are on the gold standard at this time.

Mr. BARKLEY. Legally, I say.

Mr. WHEELER. I have to disagree with the Senator in reference to that for the reason that our world commodities at the present time are not measured in value of gold, for the reason we cannot get gold and we are not paying gold, and consequently our dollar has gone down in its gold value in foreign countries. When that happened it was because of the fact that we were no longer measuring it in gold.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, what the Senator says is true in a sense, but I am speaking of the legality of the matter. There has been no enactment of Congress repealing the law that fixes the gold dollar as the standard of value. In order that the RECORD may contain it, I wish to read it. It is very short. It is section 314, United States Code Annotated, title 31:

> The dollar consisting of 25.8 grains of gold nine tenths fine shall be the standard unit of value, and all forms of money issued or coined by the United States shall be maintained at a parity of value with that standard, and it shall be the duty of the Secretary to maintain such parity.

That is what I am talking about.

Mr. WHEELER. Of course, the law still remains upon the statute books, but the truth is that when we stop payment in gold and stop shipping gold, then our commodities cease to be paid for in terms of gold.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is true as a matter of practical operation, but we are on the gold standard and still will be until Congress repeals that section of the law to which I have just referred.

Mr. President, it has been contended that by the passage of the joint resolution now before us we are depriving somebody of something. Let us admit, for the sake of argument, that we are depriving them of a legal fiction, and in my estimation that is about all it amounts to. A while ago, in argument with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], I referred to the fact that there are some twenty-odd billion dollars of outstanding obligations, payable in gold, on the part of the United States. The Senator undertook to draw an analogy between that situation and the 120,000,000 people of the United States trying to go down Pennsylvania Avenue at the same time. I do not need to refer to the entire indebtedness of the country. On the 15th of October 1938 there will fall due an issue of Liberty bonds to the amount of $6,268,000,000. On that day, 5 years from now, every man and every woman who holds one of those bonds, amounting in the aggregate to nearly 6½ billion dollars, will have the right to march up to the Treasury of the United States and demand gold in payment under the terms of the bonds. How much gold is there in the Treasury with which to meet those obligations on that date?

Mr. McADOO. Mr. President, the Senator was looking directly at me. Does the Senator ask me?

Mr. BARKLEY. A little more than $4,000,000,000.

Mr. McADOO. Does the Senator ask me the question?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I am answering my own question.

Mr. McADOO. I thought I would answer it if the Senator desired.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am glad to have the Senator answer it because I am sure he can do it much more accurately than I.

Mr. McADOO. I should like to suggest to the Senator that the Treasury has no gold with which to redeem anything.

Mr. BARKLEY. Theoretically, it has.

Mr. McADOO. Actually, it has not. The Treasury never has any gold to redeem anything unless there is a surplus in the Treasury.

Mr. BARKLEY. But its reputation is that it has about $4,000,000,000.

Mr. McADOO. It has an undeserved reputation, because, as a matter of fact, the Treasury does not own the gold.

Mr. BARKLEY. That makes the situation even worse. If we might assume there is now earmarked in the Treasury of the United States $4,000,000,000, which is all the gold in the country, it would lack $2,500,000,000 of being enough gold to discharge the obligations payable in gold on the 15th of March 1938.

Mr. McADOO. I concede that. The gold in the Treasury is earmarked, but is not earmarked for the benefit of the Treasury. It is earmarked for the benefit of the people of the United States who hold the gold notes of the United States.

Mr. BARKLEY. I understand that, and I am only answering the illustration of the Senator from Pennsylvania that if all the people of the United States were to be expected to walk down Pennsylvania Avenue at one time there would not be room enough for them, which is a ridiculous analogy. I am saying that we have built up over a period of years a legal fiction. In all probability there will not be a single bond of this more than $20,000,000,000 payable in gold that will ever be paid in gold.

Mr. McADOO. I agree with the Senator about that.

Mr. BARKLEY. Therefore we are taking nothing away from any bondholder who holds the bonds, because they did not pay for them in gold in the first place, and they will not be redeemed in gold.

Mr. McADOO. We are depriving them of a fiction, and that is all. I think the legislation is necessary to make perfectly clear the basis on which we shall proceed in the future.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is the basis of my argument, that all we are taking away is a legal fiction.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. BROWN in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. KEAN. There are $29,000,000,000 of deposits in the banks of the United States. There is about $5,000,000,000 or $6,000,000,000 of currency. Can the Senator explain how the depositors are all going to get paid?

Mr. BARKLEY. There are about 120,000,000 people in this country who would like to have an explanation of that now, and why they have not been able to get it——

Mr. KEAN. I have no doubt the Senator could explain it.

Mr. BARKLEY. Because when they went to the bank to get their money it was not there; and if this emergency shall continue and men are allowed or encouraged to hoard the gold, and in order to get the gold they surrender their bonds payable in gold, there will not be enough gold there to pay them. The same situation with respect to our gold obligations and our Treasury and our entire financial system might result that has resulted to more than 10,000 banks in the country, because the money was not there with which to redeem their promises to pay depositors.

Mr. KEAN. I would like to say to the Senator that by repudiating the gold obligations we are forcing the people of the United States to hoard gold, and that almost every man in the United States is hoarding gold because we are going to repudiate our obligations.

Mr. BARKLEY. One of the objects of the pending joint resolution is to prevent the hoarding of gold and to prevent the further escape of gold from the United States of America.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. ADAMS. May I ask the Senator if it is not true that by the gold being retained by the Federal Reserve bank we are aiding in the payment of depositors rather than otherwise? There is practically 2½ times the amount in currency issued against each dollar of gold when it is in the vaults of the Federal Reserve banks, so we are aiding in providing a supply with which depositors are paid by holding the gold rather than paying it out.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is undoubtedly true, and therefore we are preserving the basis of all our currency.

The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] a while ago said he helped to sell some of these bonds and when he made his speeches to the enthralled audiences of New Jersey, as I am sure they were, he told them they were to be paid in gold of the fineness and value at that time. Of course, I am not in a position to dispute that, but I have no doubt that that fact had very little to do with the sale of the bonds. We were issuing billions upon billions of dollars' worth of bonds in this country at that time. Everybody knew there was not enough gold to pay a single issue of Liberty bonds, such as the issue coming due in 1938, amounting to something over $6,000,000,000. They were buying those bonds on the faith of the Government and the credit of the Government of the United States. They are not being deprived of anything, because they did not pay for those bonds in gold. They paid for them in currency, and that currency is of equal value now with the very gold about which we are talking, so they are not being deprived of anything of value.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. KEAN. I should like to say to the Senator that at that time the people of New Jersey and the people of the United States bought those bonds on the gold basis, when they could have bought bonds of England or bonds of France on better than a 7-percent basis. But they believed the Government of the United States when it made its promise to pay in gold—believed that promise was good. In addition to that I should like to say to the Senator that he is mistaken that those people are getting for their bonds today the same as they paid in, because the purchasing power of the dollar has gone down nearly 20 percent in the last 2 months.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator will recall that at the time the bonds of the United States were being sold during the World War the credit of England and France had gone down to such an extent that it was necessary for us to issue those bonds and sell them to the people of the United States in order to get the money to lend to England, France, and other allied countries. Those bonds were not bought because there was a gold clause in them. They were bought because the people of our country, without regard to politics or religion, desired to uphold the hands of their Government and provide the money necessary to win a great war. If there had been no gold clause in those bonds, the amount that would have been sold to the American people would not have been a dollar less than were sold with the gold clause contained in them.

Mr. KEAN. I do not question the patriotic fervor of the people of the United States, but I do question the rate at which a bond could have been sold in currency at the time that those bonds were sold. The question of the difference in the rate was a question of the difference between 7 percent on the one hand as against 4 or 4¼ percent, and the difference was the credit of the United States as against the credit of those other countries which were engaged in the war.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course the Senator refers to the 7-percent bonds of England and France. The very fact that they were bearing 7 percent interest shows that the credit of those countries had declined to such an extent that they had to promise to pay that enormous rate of interest in order to sell their bonds at all. I refer the Senator to the fact that now the paper currency, with which we propose to pay off these bonds, if this joint resolution is passed, buys as much goods as a dollar and a half of gold would buy at the time the bonds were issued. We are not taking anything away from the bondholders. We are not depriving them of the right to use that legal tender. We have not reduced the value of their bonds by one cent. We merely propose to change the particular type of currency in which they are paid; and that type, after they get it, will buy as much as a gold dollar or a silver dollar or any other form of currency in the Nation.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky further yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. KEAN. The little Kingdom of Belgium sold its 7-percent bonds in this country during the war. Only a week ago they offered to allow those bonds, payable in dollars, to be sent abroad to be stamped so that they may be payable in gold. England is paying her bonds in gold. France is paying her bonds in gold. Every other country that has any credit at all is living up to the obligations it incurred.

Mr. BARKLEY. I think the Senator is mistaken about that. There are a lot of French bonds in England now selling below par because of the fear that they will not be paid in gold.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. My understanding is that the Treasury of the United States has bonds of France and Belgium and other countries that they are not only not paying in gold, but they are not paying them at all. They are not only not paying the bonds, but they are not paying the interest.

Mr. BARKLEY. Not even the interest.

Mr. WHEELER. Those bonds are down here in the Treasury of the United States, paid for with the people's money; and yet the Senator from New Jersey talks about France and England and Belgium and these other countries not repudiating! Why, our own Treasury has their bonds down there now, and they have refused to pay them.

Mr. KEAN. And the Senator is advocating that we repudiate our bonds to the people of the United States in the same way that France has repudiated its bonds, when we have gold in the Treasury of the United States by which we can meet every obligation.

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, no; Mr. President!

Mr. KEAN. The Senator from Kentucky is advocating that we repudiate our word, repudiate the obligation of the United States, and become in the same category as some of the South American countries.

Mr. WHEELER subsequently said: I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD at this point a statement of the foreign-government securities owned by the United States. This does not include interest accrued and unpaid.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the Senator from New Jersey rolls the word "repudiate" under his tongue as a sweet morsel. There is no question of repudiation involved here, except in the imagination of the Senator himself. The money in which we pay these obligations will buy as much as any other money issued under the authority of the United States. It will even buy the very gold in which he wants to continue to obligate the United States to discharge these obligations.

Mr. KEAN. To be sure it will; and that is just what I want the United States to do.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I think the crux of this whole controversy lies in the statement which the Senator from Kentucky has just made. I do not deify gold. I cannot commune with those who worship no god but gold. But a promise made is a debt unpaid. If the people who hold these gold obligations are to receive payment in money which is the equivalent of gold, then they have in fact and in law suffered no loss and the contract has not been breeched.

My point is this: The Refunding Act and the Credit Strengthening Act of 1869 provided that the securities of the United States should be paid in coin or its equivalent. I quote from that act:

> It is hereby provided that the faith of the United States is solemnly pledged to the payment in coin or its equivalent of all the obligations of the United States—

And so forth.

Would the Senator be willing to insert in the pending joint resolution a provision that these obligations shall be paid in gold or its equivalent? If so, that would meet my substantial objection.

Mr. BARKLEY. Personally I do not think that is necessary, because under the act of Congress recently passed all money is equivalent to gold; so that that is a redundant expression. Every dollar issued by the United States is equal to every other dollar, and the Secretary of the Treasury is charged with the solemn duty of maintaining the parity not only between gold and silver but between gold and silver and every dollar of paper money that is issued in this country. So that by operation of law every dollar is equivalent to the gold dollar, and therefore it is not necessary to include it in this joint resolution.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. How would the Senator proceed to maintain parity, with the Government refusing to pay gold? That is what we are doing here—refusing to pay gold. How are we going to maintain parity?

Mr. BARKLEY. By preserving our gold as a basis for the issuance of currency under the law as it now exists. Certainly we cannot maintain the parity of gold if we allow this gold to go out into the hands of people who either hoard it or take it abroad, and thereby reduce the amount of our gold base upon which we can issue paper money, either national-bank notes or Treasury notes or Federal Reserve notes. So this is one of the ways, if I may answer the Senator, by which we propose to preserve that parity; because if this gold is allowed to escape from its present situation, certainly the basis of our currency will be to that extent undermined, and the faith and credit of the country to that extent reduced.

Mr. FESS. The Senator certainly knows that there is no such thing as parity unless we are willing to accept that which establishes parity when the equivalent is presented. If we eliminate the gold clause, that is violating a contract which requires the payment of gold if it is demanded. The Senator knows that that is the only way to maintain parity.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course, the question of parity and the standard of values is one that is so intricate that I dare say there is not a man in the world who understands it. We talk about the value of gold and the value of silver as measured with each other and with commodities; but there is no fixed standard of value as between money and commodities, because today wheat or tobacco or corn may be worth one price, and tomorrow, as measured by dollars, it may be worth a different price, and the day after it may be worth a different price. Nobody can watch the fluctuations in the price of farm commodities or any other commodities in this country and reach the conclusion that there is, or ever can be, any fixed standard of value for either money or commodities.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I had yielded to the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FESS. That is the situation.

Mr. BARKLEY. We are in an emergency. When the emergency is over, and these restrictions with reference to the use of gold either for export or for the discharge of debts have been lifted, and we come back to what the old darkey called "nor*malcy*", then we will not, of course, need to use these artificial and temporary expedients which are now necessary because of the great emergency in which we find ourselves.

Mr. FESS. The observation the Senator makes, that there is no parity, is one in which there is a great deal of force; and that is why I am objecting to his insisting that we are maintaining parity in the very act whereby we refuse to pay gold under a contract that requires it. That destroys the parity, if there is any such thing as parity.

Mr. BARKLEY. Oh, no; the Senator and I cannot agree about that, because, as I said a while ago, the gold that is now used as a basis for the circulating currency of this country must be preserved. In my judgment, we must resort to whatever means are necessary to preserve that basis. That is the foundation, the backlog, of all our currency. If by any means, either by hoarding or by exportation, or by any other means, we dissipate that foundation or destroy that backlog, then the value of all of our currency has been destroyed.

Mr. FESS. How are we going to preserve it by this legislation?

Mr. BARKLEY. We are going to preserve it by declining, if the circumstances authorize it, to pay these obligations in gold when they become due, but pay them in money that is legal tender for all purposes.

Mr. FESS. In other words, we are going to maintain the value of our currency by refusing to recognize our promise regarding its redemption in gold.

Mr. BARKLEY. Not at all. We are going to maintain the value of our currency by preserving our gold untouched and intact, and use a substitute which has been declared by law to be equal in paying or purchasing value with the gold which we are now undertaking to preserve.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield now?

Mr. BARKLEY. I will yield again, but I do not want to take up the whole afternoon.

Mr. KEAN. I will not interrupt the Senator further, then.

Mr. BARKLEY. I am willing to yield to the Senator.

Mr. President, I think it has been established here beyond any doubt that we have the legal right to do this; that under the Constitution we may do this thing. I am unable to see that any moral question is involved, because, after all, we are taking away from nobody anything of value. We will pay them in money that will buy as much as gold; and that is all money is used for, as a medium of exchange. If I have a horse and you have a mule, and I want your mule and you want my horse, we can trade them; but if you do not happen to want my horse, and you have something else that I want, I sell my horse for money, and I take that money and buy what you have that I want. That is the only reason for the issuance of money.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS of Utah in the chair). Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from Texas?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. CONNALLY. Let me ask the Senator if the whole crux of the proposition is not this:

That the Constitution, giving the Congress the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof, gives to the Congress the power to say what is money, and incidentally gives it the power to do anything which will make that effective; that every contract is made in subordination to that suspended power of the Congress that whenever it is necessary, the Congress can pass a law making effective its control of what is money; and that any contract that runs into that, or contravenes it, has to give way before the Constitution?

Mr. BARKLEY. Undoubtedly that is true; and Congress could tomorrow, if it wanted to, pass a law destroying the value of gold as money at all by saying that hereafter gold shall not be money, silver shall not be money, but lead and tin and aluminum may be money. Congress undoubtedly has the power to do that, and by the passage of such an act it, of course, would automatically violate a contract that the Government had entered into with somebody else to pay in gold; but it would not be a violation of the constitutional power to do that thing.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield further.

Mr. CONNALLY. Is it not also true that every contract, when it is made, carries with it the constitutional provision, and the Constitution becomes a part of that contract to that extent?

Mr. BARKLEY. Undoubtedly. There is an adage which every lawyer and every citizen understands—that ignorance of the law excuses no man. It may be a rather ruthless rule sometimes, but it is a rule which has been found necessary to preserve order in civilized society. Every man who makes a contract with the Government of the United States, or with one of his fellow citizens, makes it with the understanding that Congress, within its jurisdiction and its constitutional powers, has the right to enact legislation that may impair that contract or may result in its nullification, although Congress had no such primary intention when the enactment was placed upon the statute books.

Therefore, I say it is undeniable that Congress has the unlimited power to do this. We contend that public policy, and the emergency in which we find ourselves, make it necessary to do it. It will be unfortunate if anybody suffers by it, although I do not think anybody will, because they are not to be paid in anything less valuable or less usable as money, and they are to receive money with the same purchasing power as the gold denominated in the bond.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kentucky yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is the Senator equally confident that his rule prevails where the Congress itself has made a contract, and itself has written that contract for the Government, and the Government has made the particular contract thus written by Congress?

Mr. BARKLEY. I am equally certain in that case, because in the very nature of things, I will say to the Senator, and according to the Supreme Court's own decisions, the Government of the United States cannot contract away its sovereignty; and if the Government cannot do it, Congress cannot authorize it to do it; and Congress cannot enter into a contract that deprives it of its supreme power as a sovereign to exercise that power in behalf of all the people as conditions and circumstances may demand.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me again——

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield further; yes.

Mr. JOHNSON. Eliminating the legal problem, conceding that it is as the Senator suggests—I am not questioning that as a matter of power—as a matter of propriety does the Senator think there should be any difference between the private contract that Congress subsequently abrogates in part or affects by its legislation, and the public contract that Congress itself makes for the Government and the Government itself executes?

Mr. BARKLEY. I can very easily understand how men would contend that where the Government itself has entered into a contract, it ought to be less inclined to violate that contract, even technically, than it would be to authorize the violation of a contract between two individuals. I do not draw any very fine-spun distinctions between these two types of contracts, however.

In the first place, the power of Congress and of the Federal Government to exercise their constitutional rights for the benefit of all the people, I think, takes precedence over the right of any private citizen, either in a private contract or in a public contract. Therefore, I do not think there is any very great question of morality involved here; but even if we might say that there is, we are not by this joint resolution taking anything away from anybody except a legal fiction, because, as a matter of fact, in all the history of the country these bonds have not been paid in gold. They could not be paid in gold when they became due, as I undertook to illustrate before the Senator came in. Therefore, we are taking away from them nothing but a fetish, nothing but a legal fiction that is without value so far as commodities are concerned and the exchange of commodities and the use of money in the purchase and sale of commodities.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. I desire to ask the Senator a question. I will not comment on his suggestion that this promise of the Government to pay in gold is a mere fetish.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, the Senator misunderstood me. I did not mean that a promise is a mere fetish. I mean that it is a fetish to suppose that this gold which is nominated in the bond is of any greater value to the people who obtain it than the money which they will receive, which will be of equal value to gold in purchasing commodities here and abroad.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, if the Senator will write that into this measure, he will have no quarrel with me. That is all I insist upon, that the contract be kept according to its terms, in good faith, settled in gold or its equivalent where gold was promised.

What I rose for, however, was to get the reaction of the Senator to this point. By the terms of the Bland-Allison Act, passed in 1878, it was provided that the silver dollars coined under that act should be full legal tender except as otherwise stipulated in a contract. The act passed in 1890, the Sherman Act, providing for the purchase of silver, expressly provided that the silver dollars coined in pursuance of that act should be legal tender except where otherwise stipulated in a contract. The pending joint resolution makes not only silver dollars but, as I understand it, it makes nickels and pennies, universal and unlimited legal tender.

Mr. BARKLEY. Not by this joint resolution. The act of Congress passed on May 12 last, known as the "Agricultural Act", did that.

Mr. GORE. I wish the Senator would check that.

Mr. BARKLEY. It does in a way, but it merely reiterates what the law provided for, and makes some amendment because of the fact that Philippine coins, under that section, were made legal tender in the United States.

Mr. GORE. Will not the Senator read that? I do not want to trouble him, but I would like to get it in the RECORD at this point. I believe it is the last section.

Mr. BARKLEY. It reads:

> All coins and currencies of the United States (including Federal Reserve notes and circulating notes of Federal Reserve banks and national banking associations) heretofore or hereafter coined or issued, shall be legal tender for all debts, public and private, public charges, taxes, duties, and dues, except that gold coins, when below the standard weight and limit of tolerance provided by law for the single piece, shall be legal tender only at valuation in proportion to their actual weight.

Mr. GORE. I take it that under that the Government could pay off a billion dollars of its gold bonds in pennies, in copper pennies which are now legal tender for only 25 cents.

Mr. BARKLEY. That is another legal fiction. But theoretically it could.

Mr. GORE. I do not know; perhaps it is a legal fiction that the governments of Europe are not paying us at all. They have refused to pay the money they owe the United States. I do not make much distinction between that act and the act of our own Government, which has promised to pay gold, and refuses to pay gold. Although I wish the words "the equivalent of gold" might be inserted, I make no distinction between gold and copper and cotton, or any other thing which the Government has stipulated to pay. I think it ought to keep its word according to the terms of the bond. But my point was this: Does not the Senator think that the fact that the silver dollars which were made legal tender should not be legal tender at any time where it was otherwise stipulated in the contract? If the bond had stipulated silver dollars and the bondholder desired and demanded silver dollars I should equally oppose their payment in gold. To me this is a mere matter of good faith.

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I do not, I will say to the Senator. At the time of the enactment of the two statutes to which he referred Congress undoubtedly would have had the power to go the whole distance by making those silver dollars legal tender in all cases. It did not do so because the condition of the country and the objects to be attained by that act, and the emergency, if there was one, were not such as to require or to make necessary the exercise of the power of Congress to go the whole distance, to make the silver dollars provided for in that act legal tender in all cases, which it could have done. They did not see fit to do it. The same is true with reference to the second act referred to by the Senator, the one enacted in 1878.

Mr. KEAN. But they did agree to pay in gold.

Mr. BARKLEY. The conditions which made possible the enactment of those two statutes were entirely different from the conditions which confront us now. The basis for our currency, the entire foundation, the very background, the very heart of our circulating medium, under the laws as they now stand, until they are repealed, laws providing that the gold dollar of the present standard of fineness and value should be the standard of value in this country, were not involved then. We were trying to preserve the gold we now have in our country as the basis for currency. We were trying to make it impossible for the very credit of our country and the credit of our currency and the faith of our people in that money to be undermined by a reduction in the amount of gold available as a standard of value and as a basis for our currency.

What will happen if the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania shall be adopted? I think it is undisputed that Congress has the power to do what is proposed, and that there is no immorality in doing it, that we are robbing nobody of anything of value when we do it. Therefore, why make a difference between bonds which have heretofore been issued and those which may be hereafter issued?

If it were possible to provide that all future bonds issued by the Government of the United States should be payable in any sort of coin or any sort of currency, without affecting the relative value, or, as Dr. Einstein might call it, the relativity, existing between those which have already been issued and those which may be hereafter issued, I can conceive of no serious objection to providing only for the issue of future bonds payable in this money about which we have been talking, free from the gold clause. But the very moment we make an exception, the very moment we put past obligations on a pedestal and say that Congress shall not touch them, but that all future obligations shall be payable in any kind of money which the United States sees fit to pay them in, we give to them an artificial value which they ought not to possess in comparison with the bonds which may hereafter be issued.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. KEAN. Does not the Senator think that the difference is that in one case we are living up to our obligation and the obligation sells at its true value, and that in the other the obligation will sell at its true value, too?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; I do not think there is any such question as that involved.

Mr. KEAN. Of course, there is.

Mr. BARKLEY. I would not, of course, attribute this position to the Senator from New Jersey, but it may well be that many of those in this country who hold bonds which are already in existence would like to see the future bonds payable in any kind of money, in order that the value of those they already hold might rise to an exorbitant value as compared with the future obligations of the United States, thereby making it impossible, at least difficult, for the United States to refinance its obligations in the future, or sell its bonds to the public. Of course, I acquit the Senator from New Jersey of any such purpose as that.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Can the Senator tell us how many Federal issues are coming due within the next year, the short-term certificates?

Mr. KEAN. I can give the Senator that information. They amount to $2,000,000,000, and they are practically all held by the Federal Reserve banks.

Mr. BARKLEY. There are coming due within the next few months Treasury certificates amounting to $2,122,000,000. Then there are Treasury bills amounting to $978,000,000, and they are falling due each week. These are almost daily transactions. Then, in addition to that, there are coming due obligations amounting to $3,924,000,000; in 1933 and 1934 Liberty bonds amounting to $8,201,000,000, and then, beginning in 1940, and for a period of years thereafter, obligations amounting to $5,000,000,000. So the total of these certificates and Liberty bonds amounts to over $20,000,000,000. But the Treasury bills, amounting to $978,000,000, are coming due each week; Treasury certificates amount to over $2,000,000,000; Treasury notes amount to $3,924,000,000, and then a little later there will come due Liberty bonds amounting to nearly $8,250,000,000.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, in this crisis, the holders of these bonds would all demand gold. How long would it be before the gold would be absorbed and the Government would not have any gold, and would have to pay a big premium for gold or else not be able to pay its contracts at all? Would not that be a threat to the national safety?

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, that is what I have been undertaking to show, that before the end of this year, if all these obligations were paid in gold, as they provide they shall be paid, it would exhaust the entire gold supply of the United States.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. BARKLEY. I yield.

Mr. GORE. I think the Senator is correct in his statement that Congress has the power to disfranchise the gold clause so far as future contracts are concerned. I do not think there would be any question of public morals involved in such an act. There would be a question of public policy. But the Senator has just observed that to discriminate between past and future contracts would have a depressing effect on the future contracts and would bring an enormous enhancement of value to outstanding contracts payable in gold, if I understood him.

Mr. BARKLEY. In substance I said that. I am not sure that it would undoubtedly depress future contracts. I am not certain about that. I am not certain they would sell below par, although it would undoubtedly enhance the value of the outstanding obligations.

Mr. GORE. Why would it have that effect?

Mr. BARKLEY. Because anybody who had any money to invest in United States bonds, instead of investing that money in the new bonds, would go upon the markets of the United States and buy Liberty bonds and these Treasury notes and Treasury bills because of the prospect that they might be enhanced in value and thereby return a profit to them on the transactions. To that extent the field for marketing these new securities would be restricted, if not destroyed, and it is entirely conceivable that in that way the new bonds would be depressed below their real value.

Mr. GORE. Then the owners of the outstanding gold bonds have a value that would be lost if the gold clause were disregarded?

Mr. BARKLEY. No; they do not have a value that would be lost, because the enactment of this joint resolution will have no effect upon the real value of those bonds. But the owners of those bonds might be deprived of garnering an artificial profit which they might otherwise obtain if their bonds had to be paid in gold, while future bonds are to be paid in any money that is legal tender in the United States. There is quite a difference between taking away from somebody what he has and taking away from him the opportunity to make more out of it than he should at the cost of the welfare of the United States and the condition of our people.

Mr. GORE. But I am assuming that the owners of gold bonds who have bought them in good faith, and have paid for them, bonds bearing a lower rate of interest than they would have otherwise accepted, had a real property interest in the bonds.

Mr. BARKLEY. Of course they have a property interest in the bonds, and when those bonds become due, the Government of the United States will pay them to the last dime, without any repudiation and without any reduction. They will be paid in the money which everybody else must accept in the payment of debts due them, or the money they receive for commodities produced by the sweat of their brows and their muscle and their brawn for the support of the world.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President——

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I have taken more time than I had intended to take, and I desire to draw my remarks to a close, so will ask my colleagues not to interrupt me further, because I understand we want to try to get a vote on this joint resolution this afternoon, if possible, and I do not want to delay.

For the reasons I have assigned, I hope that not only will the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania be defeated but that the joint resolution will be promptly enacted, so that there will be no further uncertainty or hesitation with reference to the attitude of our Government and our people toward this great emergency which now exists, and toward our efforts to solve it in the light of our experience and of our opportunity and of our obligations to the whole people.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, there has been no proposal that has reached either the House or the Senate in my experience that has been such a surprise to me as the one now pending. It came with a startling suddenness, without any suggestion of a situation which forced it. The manner in which it came naturally has created a doubt in my mind as to what it is intended to meet; how serious is the problem which makes it necessary that such an unusual procedure involving an open violation of the Government's pledge should be made at this time. There must be some situation which we do not understand, or no such proposal could be made by the administration.

The surprise comes largely because of the well-known views of the President of the United States. Those views have been expressed, time and again, publicly; and here is a proposal in contradiction of all that has heretofore been said, publicly, at least, by him. The question of maintaining a sound currency basis has been fundamental with both parties for the last 20 years. There have been some aberrations on the part of some leaders in both parties, but, so far as the position of the two great parties for the last 20 years, there is no question as to their stand that a sound basis of currency should be preserved at all hazards. That is the language of the platform adopted at its last national convention by the party now in control:

We advocate a sound currency to be preserved at all hazards—

And so on.

Some might have said that that declaration was made only for the purpose of catching votes. I would not make that statement. I had supposed that the leaders of the two parties honestly took that position. If I had entertained any doubt as to what was the position of the President, all doubt would have been removed by what he said, not only incidentally, here and there, but by what he said just before the election when he reviewed his position. He then said he stood upon his party's platform. I will not read from the speech of Mr. Roosevelt what was read a while ago by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED], but will only read a statement from the same speech, which was not included in the quotation of the Senator from Pennsylvania. Mr. Roosevelt, a few nights before his election as President, said:

The Democratic platform specifically declares, "We advocate a sound currency, to be preserved at all hazards." That is plain English. In discussing this platform on July 30 I said—

These are the words of the President—

"Sound money is an international necessity, not a domestic consideration for one nation alone." Far up in the Northwest, at Butte, I repeated the pledge of the plaform, saying, "Sound currency must be maintained at all hazards." In Seattle I reaffirmed my attitude on this question. The same thing has been said, therefore, in plain English three times in my speeches. It is stated without qualification in the platform, and I have announced my unqualified acceptance of that platform. So much for that misrepresentation.

The last sentence had reference to what President Hoover had said, that the election of Mr. Roosevelt would likely lead to an abandonment of the gold standard.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. FESS. I have quoted the language of the Democratic candidate, who is now President, in a speech delivered by him only a few nights before election. That ought to clarify in the minds of the people of the country the position not only of the dominant party but of the head of that party. I say that this proposal came with such startling suddenness and as such a surprise and it involves such possibilities that I am concerned about what the President thinks we are to confront in the future and what causes him to make the proposal here presented. I now yield to my friend from Colorado.

Mr. ADAMS. Mr. President, I am wondering if two things have not been confused in the discussion of the Senator from Ohio. He stated that the President declared that he proposed to maintain a sound currency. It occurs to me that the very purpose of the pending joint resolution is to do that very thing. Our currency is maintained by the gold reserve behind it. The purpose of this measure, as I gather it, is to preserve that gold reserve, to prevent it being paid out upon bonds, so that the gold reserve may back up our currency and give us a gold currency. If there is an attack to be made upon the joint resolution, it is not because under it the currency is not to be sound but because there is a repudiation, if Senators wish to use the term, of the strict letter of the bond, not of the currency. The joint resolution itself specifically excepts and exempts the currency of the country from its provisions, and leaves the currency still payable in gold.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, for a hundred years there has been discussed in this country the question of a sound money system, and never before has anyone had the audacity to suggest that the abandonment of the gold basis, upon which the value of currency is founded, is an adherence to a sound currency system. No one has ever taken such a view as that. There have been two schools of thought in America, and they are not confined to one political party. There are representatives of both schools in all political parties. There is not a political party, including the Republican Party, and certainly including the Democratic Party, that does not have within it those who belong to the school of sound money and those who belong to the school of soft money. It remains for the defenders of this administration in the effort to go off the gold standard to say that this course is to be done in order to maintain a sound currency, in the hope that they can make the people believe that there has not been any change of view on the part of the leader of the administration.

Mr. President, if that is not true, there must come an explanation of why the man in the Democratic Party who speaks with the voice of authority for sound money was called from his sick bed to reply to the statement of President Hoover that we were about to go off the gold standard, and that we would go off the gold standard if the Democratic Party were elected. From that sick bed came this voice in the party in behalf of sound money, and bitter resentment was expressed because of the suggestion that we were going off the gold standard. The man who wrote the plank on sound currency in the Democratic platform is the man who was called from his sick bed to denounce the statement that the Democratic Party would take the Nation off the gold standard. Now to put the lie in his mouth and to maintain that the abandonment of the gold standard is in the interest of the maintenance of a sound currency is too silly for anybody to contemplate for a moment.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. FESS. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have no desire to get into a controversy about the speeches made in the last campaign, but I do recall distinctly that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], to whom the Senator from Ohio is referring, in that great speech which he made was answering the argument put forth by Mr. Hoover and by Secretary Mills that the United States had been within 2 weeks of going off the gold standard, and if it had not been for him it would have been off the gold standard. But, be that as it may, does the Senator admit that if we had never issued these obligations, if the Government had never had to borrow any money from the very beginning, the question of the gold standard would not have been involved?

Mr. FESS. I do not think that the question of the gold standard is seriously involved in the original issue of those bonds. In other words, I do not know that I can agree with some of my friends who say that the bonds were sold because the gold clause was in them. I am certain that constituted an element of marketability, perhaps, but I am of the opinion that too much emphasis is being put on that.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator will admit, will he not, that at the time these bonds were issued Congress could have provided that they could have been payable in legal tender or in any kind of money that Congress wanted to provide, and therefore, even under those circumstances, their issuance would not have involved the gold standard?

Mr. FESS. Congress could have so provided, but it was feared that they would not be marketable if that was done.

Mr. BARKLEY. But I say that if Congress has the power to do that it could have done it, and if those bonds had been issued payable in any money that is legal tender that would not in any way have affected the gold standard in the United States, would it?

Mr. FESS. Does the Senator mean that it would have changed the law?

Mr. BARKLEY. It would not have changed the law, and it would not have changed the fact at all. We could have provided in the beginning that all these bonds should be paid in any kind of money, and still we would have been on the gold standard, and we would be on the gold standard now.

Mr. FESS. Provided we did not go off.

Mr. BARKLEY. We have not gone off.

Mr. FESS. Oh, yes; we have gone off the gold standard.

Mr. BARKLEY. If, in the beginning, we could have issued these bonds payable in any kind of money without affecting the gold standard, how does it affect the gold standard now if we provide that they shall be paid in the same kind of money in which we could have provided they should be paid in the original issue of the bonds?

Mr. FESS. I am not talking now about what the pending measure is doing; I am talking about what we have already done. I am not questioning the legality or the constitutionality of the power of Congress to do this particular thing; I am rather inclined to believe, in the light of the decisions that have been rendered and the discussion of the various cases before those decisions were made, that under the power of Congress to coin money and regulate the value thereof and to establish weights and measures, we have the power to say how many grains shall be in a unit, whether it shall be legal tender or not, and that later on we may change it under our constitutional authority. I am not going to discuss the constitutionality of it. While it is a mooted question whether the fifth amendment is applicable, the argument to that effect has not greatly impressed me. I am perfectly willing to waive the question as to whether we have constitutional authority to do it, and to assume that we have.

What I rose to say was that this sudden resolution is so far-reaching that it reaches the point of an open violation in the case of a contract between the Government and its citizens of the terms the Government wrote into that contract. I think we could change the terms without regard to the other party if we wanted so to do, but I count it an immoral thing to do, so immoral that there must be some explanation of why we propose to do it.

I tried to ascertain these possibilities and of what must be in the mind of the administration to lead it to take this unusual course in asking us to violate a solemn pledge that the Government has made. I can see one side to it. In all probability it is the determining factor. We are going to have enormous obligations maturing soon. Heretofore we have always relied upon refinancing by refunding a portion and paying a portion; that is, what we can pay we will pay, and what we cannot pay we will have to renew, in the hope that we may refund at a lower rate of interest and in that way save something to the people of the country. These obligations, if paid, can only be paid through taxation or through borrowing. There is a limit to taxation. It is not possible for us through the sources of taxation to meet these obligations which are coming due. We must rely upon borrowing. In view of the emergency legislation that is entailing billions of additional money that must be raised, that means today an increase in the interest on the public debt from $600,000,000 in 1930 to an amount now above the billion dollar mark that must be paid every year. That obligation will have to be paid either by taxes or by borrowing.

How do we propose to meet the obligations of nearly $8,000,000,000 that will come due before October 1 of this year if all the legislation now enacted and yet to be enacted becomes operative? What is the possibility of financing these obligations? It cannot be done by increased taxation. There are only two ways left to do it. One is to pay them by issuing fiat money, as we have authorized the President to do to the amount of $3,000,000,000, and the other is to borrow. If we go to the full extent of the application of the fiat issue of $3,000,000,000, there will still be $5,000,000,000 to be paid. How are we going to meet that? There is no other way except by borrowing. The President by decree has taken us off the gold standard, and he cannot issue the $5,000,000,000 with the gold clause therein when he has taken us off the gold standard. That would be an inconsistency and he does not want to face it.

The apologists for the financing of the Treasury are openly stating that we pass this measure in the interest of financing these obligations. What is the embarrassment? In the face of the decree taking us off the gold standard we cannot write the gold clause into the bonds now to be issued. If we do, it is a violation of the position we have taken as a National Government in the last 3 weeks, and so we are not going to do it.

Then, if we do not write in the gold clause, our bonds will not be marketable, as is admitted by the proponents of the measure. They want to make them marketable and the only way they can do it is to drag down to the level of the issue they must make all the existing Government bonds that now have the gold clause. Men say that is not dishonorable, that that is a high standard of financial ethics. To me it is the most amazing thing that has ever been promulgated in finance so far as I know.

This is what will happen. If it is conceivable that the only thing that is back of a bond is the good faith of the Government that issues it, is it conceivable that with that good faith gone by the passage of this joint resolution, we will make the future stable? Who wants to buy obligations of any government that will not maintain the promise of its contract? We will fail to finance these obligations and we cannot make these bonds marketable because we are by this act destroying the credit of the Government.

What is the remedy? Mark my word, Senators, then comes what we have always been afraid of, a new issue of greenbacks, of fiat, to meet what we cannot meet by borrowing. If we can start the printing presses and print the $5,000,000,000 we need, it will not cost the Government any more than the cost of the paper and the ink and the labor. When on October 1 this financing is confronted, we will see then what will be the effect of an open violation of the faith of this Government in refusing to keep its word to its citizens.

Mr. President, I have said all along that whenever we start on a question of inflation, under whatever name it may be called—managed currency, assuming that inflation can be controlled, which is abject nonsense—we start something that will not be stopped. This country is facing a situation where we will have to issue our obligations to meet what otherwise we cannot meet because of our failure to borrow, because we are destroying our credit as a nation.

That is the economic side of the issue. The moral side of it is the thing that impresses and disturbs me. Possibly we have a perfect legal right to do this. My good friend from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] has said that he does not see any immorality in it. Whenever the terms of a contract are written in the contract and one of the contracting parties, without the permission of the other contracting party, but simply because he has the power to do it, proceeds to change the terms of the contract in open violation of the contract, that is an immoral act, as it appears to me.

The immorality in it is denied on the basis that it will not have any particular bad effect. It has been argued over and over that we will still maintain the parity of all money. I know that the resolution is designed to do that, and the element that is the resolution to give that power is the legal-tender feature that is written in it, making all money legal tender for all debts, including even national-bank currency that is not a Government obligation at all, and never has been thought of to be included in the realm of legal tender. The resolution undertakes to legalize, as a tender in the payment of debts, any money of whatever denomination we may have issued.

The mere fact of legal tender is not sufficient to maintain the value in the payment of obligations. There is no power in any government to give value where there is no value. We can change prices by decree of law, but we cannot change values, as the distinguished occupant of the chair at this time, Mr. THOMAS of Utah, knows very well because of his background. It is easy for us by decree to make a different price, but legislation does not create values and cannot add to value.

The law can say that this particular thing is so and so. So far as the exchange value would go in price that might be true, but when we undertake by law to say, " This is what it is not ", that is not true, although we do it so far as the law can go. The mere fact of picking up a piece of paper and stamping it as a dollar does not make it a dollar. If we could do that, then the Government ought to print thousand dollar bills instead of dollar bills. It would not take any more paper or ink or labor. But we do not do it because we cannot create value by Government decree. When we talk about maintaining parity of all these currencies, national bank notes, Federal Reserve bank notes, Federal Reserve notes, gold certificates, and whatnot—when we undertake to maintain parity, thereby saying through the Government that this buys so much, that does not make it buy so much. There is not power enough in Washington to make it so if the law of supply and demand is operating the other way.

Men talk about maintaining parity in the different moneys and eliminating gold, which is the measure unit. It is folly, it is absurd to talk about parity of that kind. The moment we put gold in circulation, and paper money that is not redeemable in gold, the paper money will drive out of circulation every dollar of gold within a month.

There is no better established principle in law or in physics, in science or in economy, than that where good and bad money are in circulation together, the bad money always drives out of circulation the good money.

If we say we are maintaining gold and yet going off the gold standard, it is folly to talk about maintaining a parity. It is a parity in that nothing will have value. It is like the old woman who was told that the drought had destroyed her potato crop. She said, "Well, thank God, one consolation is, if I do not have any potatoes, nobody else will have any!" [Laughter.] That is what we are doing when we eliminate gold as the basis and expect currency to circulate on a parity with gold.

The opposition has been offered over and over by those who have spoken that we have to do this. They do not want to say "Go off the gold standard", but that is what they have done. It is said that we have to do this in order that we may carry on business, on the ground that there is not gold enough to do the business of the country.

Mr. President, the past rises before me like a dream. I am carried back to 1896, when every street corner in every town had a soap-box orator on it declaring that the gold standard must be abandoned. Never in my life, or the life of anyone living, was there such general excitement over any political question that had become an issue in a campaign. The same argument that we have heard on this floor today was made then and repeated a thousand times—that there was not gold enough in the country to do the business of the country.

Mr. President, I have always been in favor of reasonably enlarging the specie basis of our circulation. I have never been opposed to the use of silver on such a parity with gold as the governments will agree upon, so that there will be no advantage taken. That is, if we should coin silver and make it legal tender in relation to gold on a ratio that represents the present actual market value, the silver dollar would be too large, too bulky. That means that there would have to be some seigniorage element in the silver, by which the silver dollar, if sold as bullion, would be greater in price than that much bullion; but, in order to avoid embarrassment arising out of that, it would be necessary for us to have the governments of the world agree upon some ratio.

I have always been for it. I am for it now. I would not be in favor of the free and unlimited coinage of silver at any particular ratio. Of course I would not, for that would immediately drive gold out of circulation. I am, however, in favor of the addition of silver upon a basis that can be agreed upon; but at that time international agreement was taboo. It was thought that all that was necessary was for us to announce the basis of 16 to 1, and then everything would be lovely. The argument was that we had to do it because we did not have money enough to do the business of the country.

Mr. President, no one knows better than the occupant of the chair [Mr. THOMAS of Utah] that the quantity of money is not the element that makes value, and it is not even the element that determines prices. It has some effect, but very little; and over and over in the last Congress the agitation was that we must have more money. The Borah amendment to the home-loan bank bill was offered for that purpose. That would permit us to issue $1,600,000,000 more in bank money. Look at the pitiful amount that was issued under it. Then under the emergency banking bill we revived the old, effete idea of basing a bank issue on Government bonds, and we authorized an issuance of Federal Reserve bank currency with a basis of $3,000,000,000 of bonds.

Not very much currency was issued. As the President will recognize, for a time we issued up to $4,000,000,000 of United States Federal Reserve notes and national-bank notes. That was to meet the emergency; but it is recognized that as the currency is increased, if there is not a demand for it in business, it immediately becomes idle and is of no use. That is what we are suffering from now. The quantitative theory of money has some value; but those who insist that we must go off the gold standard on the ground that we have not enough gold to do business are in error—as if a gold standard means that every contract that is written must be paid in gold and will be paid in gold.

Mr. President, there are over $100,000,000,000 of contracts now with the gold clause, outside of the Government obligations, and there are all the contracts that the Government has entered into in the form of bonds with the gold clause, and yet there may not be one dollar of gold demanded in the payment. It would not be necessary. The only thing that is necessary is for the Government to announce that it will not violate its contract, and then no bondholder will want to redeem his bond in gold. The moment we discriminate, however, we make gold of a superior value, and every man who can get it will hold it; and there is no law I know of that can make it come out of hiding.

I have been somewhat amused at the argument that we must do this thing because we have not gold enough to pay these obligations in gold. That is folly. It is a simple statement. It is not even elemental. The only thing that is necessary is for the citizen who holds an obligation of the Government to know that the Government is going to treat him honorably. He will not demand payment in gold. He will demand it in any money the Government has which is equivalent to gold.

What has become of the proud boast of America that it does not make any difference in what corner of the globe it may be; it does not make any difference whether it is an American gold dollar, an American silver dollar, an American greenback, an American national-bank note, an American Federal Reserve bank note, an American Federal Reserve note, or whatnot; wherever that obligation is, whether it is in China, in the South Seas, or in any corner of civilization, it passes for 100 cents on the dollar? What has become of that proud boast? Why has it been true in the past? Because Uncle Sam has always been known as honoring his pledge. When he gives a promise he will not violate it.

What now becomes of the pledge? Here our friends are saying that we shall depend now on nothing except the promise of the Government. All we need to do now, it is said, is to issue these bonds on the promise of the Government and believe that they will stay at par, while in the very same breath we are arguing that the Government shall not keep its promise!

Mr. President, I have sympathy with the people who are in debt. I belong to that class. Most of us are. For a man of limited means, I have had as much misfortune in unfortunate investments as most other people. I can state that every investment was made on the basis that I thought it was a safe thing. I never played the market. I never bought a thing in my life on the stock exchange. I never allowed anybody else to do it for me; but I have made a few small investments. All of them have gone the way that most investments go. I have sympathy for people who are in debt. I have voted for bankruptcy laws, and I will vote for the mortgage relief bill. Usually, when we get in debt and have trouble to pay, we tighten up our belts, work a little harder, are a little more frugal, are as industrious as possible and as economical as possible, in the hope that we can meet our obligations; and if we cannot, then we will sometimes ask for the privilege of bankruptcy relief, and we will go into bankruptcy.

I never believed the Government of the United States would come to that position; but there is where we are today.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. FESS. In a moment.

Senators are stating, time and time again, that we cannot meet our obligations. It cannot be done. We must do this in an emergency. Do what? Confess our bankruptcy, and say we cannot pay, and demand, without the agreement of the other party, that we shall shave down the debt and pay it in terms which are a violation of what we originally agreed to. That is the position in which this Government is today—openly confessing its bankruptcy.

I yield to my friend from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I ask the able Senator from Ohio if he has not unconsciously fallen into error in his statement that these contracts calling for the value of gold of so much fineness, and so forth, call for the delivery of coined gold. Does not my friend realize, and will he not acknowledge, that a contract for the value of so much gold, described as of so much fineness, means only money of the value of the gold? It does not mean to deliver the gold. May I not insist that my able friend recognizes that that kind of a contract does not call for the delivery of gold, but only for money of the value of gold?

Mr. FESS. Exactly.

Mr. LEWIS. It might be the greenback of the United States, which in the East Indies and the West Indies and anywhere else in the world is recognized as the money of the United States of America.

Mr. FESS. I wish the Senator from Illinois had been here when his colleagues were talking about our inability to settle our obligations in gold because we did not have gold enough, as if the contract had to be settled in gold. Nobody ever thought any such thing as that. In other words, I want to observe that we are maintaining the standard of our contracts, and probably it will not be asked that one of these bonds be settled in gold. Not one gold dollar will be asked. Yet on every hand people say we must take this action because there is not gold enough to take care of the face of the bonds. That is a silly statement. I would not think anybody would be impressed by such a statement as that. In other words, just as the Senator from Illinois has stated, it is a question of the value of the money, and not a question of the particular kind of delivery that will be made when the contract is paid.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I am equally anxious to ask my able friend in what way, then, does the United States indicate what he describes to be a state of bankruptcy? If upon the basis of gold, our money, of whatever nature, is still of the value of gold, where is it bankruptcy if we have both the credit and the money, of any kind or all kinds, to meet our obligations?

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I thank the Senator for calling my attention to my statement. I want to omit the word "bankruptcy." I do not mean that our Government is in bankruptcy. I mean that the argument that is being offered that we must take this action is an argument that we are in bankruptcy. It is far from my belief that this Nation is in bankruptcy. I think probably my statement might indicate that I thought that, but I do not. On the other hand, I think the Nation has all the natural resources upon which to build a great prosperity, if we could only unlock those resources. But we are far from actual bankruptcy. The argument that we must take this action because we cannot meet the situation is to contend that we ought to go into a court of bankruptcy and have some adjustment made.

I will say to my friend from Illinois, and I should like to have his reaction to this, that I am not sure, if we go on as we are asked to do by this measure, whether we will not be in the position where we will not be able either to borrow sufficient money or to collect taxes with which to meet our obligations. That situation is a dangerous one.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I reply to my able friend by confessing that I do not understand what he implies by the suggestion that we will tamper with our credit.

Mr. FESS. Tampering with the credit is changing the terms of a contract without the consent of both contracting parties.

Mr. LEWIS. My answer to that is that changing a contract may not in any way tamper with the credit. It may really enhance it in the hands of those who hold the obligation.

Mr. FESS. I am rather surprised at that answer, coming from my friend from Illinois.

Mr. LEWIS. Unless my able friend can indicate to me that a contract is tampered with and its credit depreciated, merely because of a change in the method of payment, I could not agree with him.

Mr. FESS. Let me illustrate what I mean. The Government has followed a policy for 60 years. That policy is to be changed by changing the terms of our contracts. I think that if we changed the terms of all the bonds hereafter to be issued, there would be no immorality, but I think there would be dangerous economic consequences if we should say that from now on we would not issue any bonds containing the gold-redemption clause. I think that economically would have a bad effect, but morally we have a perfect right to do it. However, when we change the contracts already issued, and modify them, taking out a clause which was regarded as an element necessary in their sale, I think it is, first, immoral, and, secondly, certainly would endanger the future credit of our Government.

Whatever differences we may have there is one thing which heretofore never was in dispute, that we have the shade of George Washington pleading for the maintenance of a national credit, of James Madison, of Andrew Jackson, of old Thomas H. Benton, of all the leaders of democracy and of the Whigs, when they were pleading that the Government should never drop below the level of a high moral standard in the observance of its promises.

Not even in Civil War times was any such effort as this made. Think of the type of leadership of Grover Cleveland. I could not help thinking of John G. Carlisle when the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY] was speaking today. What a power for the national credit was that great statesman of Kentucky. Think of the great array of men who never would compromise with any element of dishonor when it came to the question of the National Government maintaining its word. Then see to what lengths we are being led today. There must be some explanation for it.

There is one thing we cannot ever afford to do, and that is go back on the honor of the Nation when we have once pledged it. There is one position the United States never must take; we must not ever stoop to the low level of a promise made only to be broken.

If this Nation maintains its high honor—and if that is gone there is not very much left—if it maintains its high honor, it must not tamper with the obligations it has written into the law.

We used to say, "His word is as good as his bond" and "His pledge is equal to that of the Government." If we enact this measure, what is the pledge of the Government? A solemn promise broken. Men are apt to jeer because they say the bondholder is a rich man. Not at all. We all engaged in the campaign for the sale of Liberty bonds in 1917 and 1918. Congress passed the authorization, and the last clause of the bond authority provided an appropriation for floating those bonds, an appropriation of something like $2,000,000 to pay the expenses of floating the bonds of the Government.

To whom were those bonds sold? To any and all citizens, and one who did not buy until it hurt was regarded as an ingrate. The bonds were not sold alone to the moneyed people. The campaign upon which we entered throughout this Nation included an approach to men and women who were ill-prepared to buy bonds, but we put it up to them that it was their duty to buy them, and they bought them.

I do not mean that the gold clause written in the bond was so much of an element in the sale of the bonds. It might have been to the big buyers, but it was not so to a very large proportion of the people. But it must not be understood that that is not an element of value in those bonds; and there should be no movement to take it out, because if left in, it will make issues of future bonds of less value. That is confessedly the reason for the attempt to take out that clause. That itself is dishonorable, because it is an effort, immediately a confession, that we will take out of the bonds already in existence some value that is in them.

Mr. President, there are 2 or 3 other items I desire to discuss. One is as to the effect of the effort to enforce a contract in the courts of the United States because it contains specific terms, if the Government itself, which supports the courts, will not respect the terms of its contracts. Then I want to discuss another feature, the effect this action would have upon what we will receive from the countries of Europe in settlement of their debts to us in the depreciated currencies of those countries. Although France is on a gold basis, she has stabilized her franc at only one fifth of its real worth in terms of gold, and the question is whether, after having canceled more than one half of her debt, we are to be paid one fifth of the balance of it.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me to suggest the absence of a quorum?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, of course the Senator has a right to suggest the absence of a quorum, but I hope very much that we may proceed. This is a very urgent matter, and we have not very much time.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, it is now 4 o'clock on Saturday afternoon, and most of the Senators are absent from the Chamber. It is not fair that a few should be required to remain here if there is not to be a quorum. Therefore I insist upon my suggestion of the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Cutting	King	Russell
Ashurst	Dickinson	La Follette	Schall
Bachman	Dieterich	Lewis	Sheppard
Bailey	Dill	Logan	Shipstead
Bankhead	Duffy	Lonergan	Smith

Clark	Kean	Reynolds
Connally	Kendrick	Robinson, Ark.
Coolidge	Keyes	Robinson, Ind.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Eighty-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The Senator from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President——

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator from Ohio yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask the Senator from Ohio to yield to me for a moment in order that I may make a statement. It was announced to the Senate on yesterday that it would be necessary, if possible, to vote on the pending joint resolution today. The indications are that the debate will be prolonged. Notwithstanding, I make the request that all Senators remain in access to the Chamber, in order that a vote may be had without the necessity of sending out for Senators. That will be done, however, if the necessity arises.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, will the Senator from Arkansas yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Oregon?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. McNARY. Will the Senator permit me to propound an inquiry?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Certainly.

Mr. McNARY. I know it is the desire of the Senator to get a vote on this very important measure today. The Senator knows, however, the difficulty of getting a quorum on Saturdays, when there is such a great accumulation of work. In view of the present situation, would it not be possible to make an agreement as to a time for voting on Monday?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am aware of what the Senator states; but the fact is well known—it has been announced—that the Treasury has a number of important transactions to be undertaken on Monday, June 5. For that reason it was announced several days ago that it was desired that this joint resolution be acted on prior to that date. That is the reason I am not in a position to consent to postponing a vote until Monday. I realize that all that the Senator from Oregon has said is true; yet, notwithstanding that fact, when the absence of a quorum was unexpectedly suggested a few moments ago, a quorum immediately responded; and I desire now to express my thanks to Senators for the promptness with which that result was secured.

Mr. McNARY. It occurred to me that possibly Monday would not be too late a day to bring about a vote on the joint resolution. If that were done, it would accommodate a great many Senators.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Announcement was made 2 or 3 days ago that the effort would be made to dispose of this joint resolution not later than today; it was thought that it might be done earlier, so that we might recess over today, but I repeat I am not in a position to consent to a postponement; and it is my policy—and I say it frankly—insofar as I can do so, to keep the Senate in session today until the vote shall be taken.

Mr. FLETCHER. I want to say to the Senator from Arkansas that all arrangements have been made for issuing certain notices by the Treasury Department on Monday, and the Department cannot go on with that until this measure shall have been acted on; so it is necessary to proceed with it now.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I am not finding any fault whatever with the position of the Senator from Arkansas. Only a few days ago I talked with him about these two measures, this one and the industrial recovery bill, and said to him that unless we speeded up the measure then delaying us we would not get through unless we held night sessions, and that we might not get through even then. I told him that these two measures would require some time for discussion. The Senator from Arkansas knows very well that what I am saying is within reasonable limits of time. I am not killing time, as he knows. This proposed legislation is to me the most important measure that has yet come before us, for it deals with the credit of the Government and its solemn pledge.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I do not wish to question the good faith of the Senator from Ohio or of any other Senator, but I think I do see signs—and I think everybody else here who is not blind sees them—of a disposition on the part of some Senators to protract this debate and to carry the issue over, so that the Treasury Department will be under a condition of uncertainty when it finds it necessary to act. I myself do not care to contribute to that end, and I am making it plain to Senators now that, so far as I am concerned, I will seek a vote on this measure before there shall be either a recess or an adjournment.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, so far as reaching a decision on this measure is concerned, it is perfectly obvious that it would be the most foolish thing for anyone who is opposed to it to enter into any kind of obstructive tactics to delay a vote. The votes for it are here; they are going to be cast for it; the decree has gone forth. I know before the vote is taken what the result will be, and everyone else knows it. I have not the slightest desire to defer a vote for a minute. All I want to do is to express my opposition to the action about to be taken and to give some of the reasons why I so seriously disapprove of what we are proposing here to do. I shall not detain the Senate for more than 10 or 15 minutes and then I shall be through.

I think when the Government sets the example of breaking its own pledge and ignoring the terms of its own contract, it opens the way for everyone who does not want to abide by the terms of a contract into which he has entered to disregard it; and when the terms of a contract are disregarded and the courts are called upon to determine whether its terms can be changed, the Government that changes the terms of its own contract is in a poor position to enforce the decree of a court that refuses to allow the terms of a contract to be changed. I know there must be something serious in the background or we would not be asked to humiliate ourselves to the degree of causing the Government to violate its solemn pledge.

Not only that, but we are complaining here, and rightfully so, against our foreign debtors for not expressing a willingness, at least, to the extent of their ability, to pay what they owe us. I do not know whether there is going to be any serious effort on the part of some of those countries to pay what they owe. Of course, we cannot enforce payment. We would not be so foolish as to resort to the only possible way to enforce it, which would be war. We would not think of such a thing as that. If those countries decide to default, I see no remedy at all so far as forcing them to pay is concerned.

But how can we show any distaste or retribution of any kind against a debtor country that refuses to obey the terms of a contract when our own country violates the terms of its own contract with its own citizens? It immediately gives an opportunity and a background for those nations to say, "You do not pay your own citizens in accordance with the terms of your own contract. We therefore are not bound to respect the terms of our contract." I have never said very much about the position of those countries. I have come to the conclusion that every step indicates that they are going to default in a measure. If they decide to default, that is their business. So far as I am concerned, however, I do not propose ever to vote an agreement to permit them to cancel. But if we do not obey the terms of the contract this Government makes with its own citizens, how can we have the face to say to those countries that they must obey the terms of the contract we have with them?

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Ohio yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. FESS. I yield.

Mr. WHEELER. When we demonetized silver in 1873, we did exactly the same thing then with silver that we are now doing with gold, because bonds at that time were payable in either gold or silver; that is, they were payable in coin.

Mr. FESS. The Senator has frequently referred to that fact. The Senator knows that up to 1873 there were only about 8,000,000 silver dollars in circulation in all our history. Silver in the bullion was worth more than silver in the coin; so it was not profitable to use silver for money, because it was more profitable to use it as a commodity. When the question of monetization was dropped out of the law, there was no thought that there was to be any great reduction of the monetary circulation, because there was no silver in circulation at that time, as the Senator knows. I have heard that statement a thousand times, and yet those are the facts, and the Senator knows it. The Senator does not want to drive me to opposition with his view on silver, does he?

Mr. WHEELER. No; but I do want to call attention to this fact: Before we demonetized silver, silver was worth more than bullion. Consequently, the person who held Government bonds that were payable in coin was deprived of having the bonds paid in silver. In other words, we did then with silver exactly what we are doing now with gold. Daniel Webster contended that we had no constitutional right to do it; but, notwithstanding that fact, we did it.

Mr. FESS. The Senator knows that Daniel Webster was dead 20 years before the demonetization of silver took place. He died in 1852, and the demonetization of silver took place in 1873.

Mr. WHEELER. He contended always that we had no right to demonetize silver. I have his speech. If the Senator has any doubt with reference to it, I can get a specific quotation from the speech he delivered in the Congress of the United States.

Regardless of that fact, I say that when we demonetized silver, when the bonds of the United States provided that they should be paid in coin of the United States, we did to silver then exactly what we are doing now to gold; and there was no contention by those who then believed so faithfully in gold that we were depriving the people of the country of any contractual right which they had with the Government.

Mr. FESS. Does my friend endorse the demonetization of silver in 1873?

Mr. WHEELER. I did not.

Mr. FESS. Does he endorse it now?

Mr. WHEELER. No, indeed; I do not. I should like to see it remonetized; but because of the fact that we have not remonetized it, we are driving the Government to do exactly what we are doing at this present time. If the Senator from Ohio had gone along with me with reference to the remonetization of silver, we would not have found ourselves in the position we are in, where we are compelled to go off the gold standard and in effect demonetize gold so far as the United States is concerned.

Mr. FESS. The Senator has stated that what we did in 1873 to silver is nothing more than we are doing now to gold; and yet he condemns that step, but he approves this one. It is rather singular for the Senator to take both those positions in the same breath.

Mr. WHEELER. The Senator misunderstood me. I say we have a constitutional right to do it. Under the Constitution we have the right to do it.

Mr. FESS. I do not deny it.

Mr. WHEELER. Under the Constitution we have a right to do this.

Mr. FESS. I do not deny it.

Mr. WHEELER. I thought the Senator was contending that under the Constitution we have no right to do it.

Mr. FESS. No. I am of the opinion, while it is a disputed question, that there is no violation of the Constitution in this particular proposal.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me for a personal statement?

Mr. FESS. I am very glad to yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. I find that I am obliged to leave the Senate. I simply desire to announce for the RECORD that if present I should vote against the passage of the joint resolution, and that I am paired with the senior Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH].

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, there would be nothing so surprising to me as an announcement from the Senator from Virginia that he would be anything else than opposed to such a measure as this. My only surprise is that there are so many Senators who ought to think as he is thinking, but who, for some reason or other, take the view that we can violate the contract of our Government with its citizens, and who still think we can float bonds on a basis of that kind. I am anxious to see what will be the progress and the success of this Government up to October 1, when we come to float bonds to meet the maturing obligations. Then we will remember what has been said here today.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The joint resolution is still open to amendment.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I was on my feet to secure recognition before the amendment was adopted. I feel that we should have an expression by a roll call on the amendment. I ask unanimous consent that the vote by which the amendment was adopted may be reconsidered, and that we may have a roll call upon the adoption of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. McNARY. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Adams	Connally	Keyes	Robinson, Ind.
Bachman	Dickinson	King	Russell
Bailey	Dieterich	La Follette	Schall
Bankhead	Dill	Lewis	Sheppard
Barbour	Duffy	Logan	Shipstead
Barkley	Erickson	Lonergan	Smith
Black	Fess	McCarran	Steiwer
Bone	Fletcher	McGill	Thomas, Okla.
Borah	Frazier	McNary	Thomas, Utah
Bratton	George	Metcalf	Thompson
Brown	Goldsborough	Murphy	Townsend
Bulkley	Gore	Neely	Trammell
Bulow	Harrison	Norris	Vandenberg
Byrd	Hatfield	Overton	Van Nuys
Byrnes	Hayden	Patterson	Wagner
Capper	Hebert	Pope	Walcott
Caraway	Johnson	Reed	Wheeler
Carey	Kean	Reynolds	White
Clark	Kendrick	Robinson, Ark.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-five Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. McNARY. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I desire to occupy not more than 3 to 5 minutes prior to the vote.

A few moments ago I sent to the desk an amendment to this joint resolution. When I sent the amendment to the desk, however, it was not my purpose to ask for a vote on it this afternoon. Therefore, I will leave the amendment on the desk to be printed and offer it to some other bill in the early part of next week.

Briefly, the amendment deals with the situation portrayed in an article which appeared in the Washington Times yesterday afternoon, headed "Forestry Vets Sacrificing Benefits", which I ask to have printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FORESTRY VETS SACRIFICING BENEFITS—BONUS ARMY BOYS WHO JOINED CORPS CANNOT CONTINUE TO DRAW COMPENSATION

Members of the last bonus army here who volunteered for the reforestation service will lose their veterans' disability compensation.

The Veterans' Administration said today that such men would come under section 10 of the President's revised veterans' relief regulations.

THREE CLASSES HIT

This section stipulates:

"No person holding office or position, appointee or elective, under the United States Government or municipal government of the District of Columbia or any corporation, the majority of stock of which is owned by the United States, shall be paid a pension or emergency officers' pay, except (1) those receiving pension or emergency officers' retirement pay for disabilities incurred in combat with an enemy of the United States, and (2) those persons so employed who are protected by special provisions of the act."

The Veterans' Administrator explained that the regulation applies not only to the veterans who enlisted in the reforestation service but to member employees in veterans' homes and hospitals and to certain Government employees receiving small salaries in addition to compensation from the administration.

NO MORE CHECKS

The Veterans' Administrator, Gen. Frank T. Hines, it was said, has these three classes under consideration with reference to what recommendations might be made to the President in their behalf.

Meanwhile the bonus boys who became foresters at the Government's invitation are going to receive a shock when their next compensation check is due.

They aren't going to collect.

Mr. TRAMMELL. The substance of this article is that the veterans who have enlisted in the Government's reforestation service have lost their compensation or their pension on account of entering that service, under some law which says that veterans shall not be allowed compensation when in the Government service, and also under a regulation which has been promulgated.

I think there must have been some oversight in attempting to take the compensation or pension away from some poor, destitute veteran who entered the reforestation service, where he is to receive only $30 per month. It is to protect him against this, which I believe to be an injustice, and certainly the result of some order or regulation that was not seriously considered, that I have sent the amendment to the desk and shall offer it to some other bill early next week. I do not want to delay a vote on this measure.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED].

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas and other Senators called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. REED. May the amendment be stated?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, line 10, after the word "obligation" it is proposed to strike out the words "heretofore or", so as to read:

Every obligation, hereafter incurred—

And so forth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. FRAZIER (when Mr. NYE's name was called). On this question my colleague [Mr. NYE] is paired with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. If my colleague were present he would vote "nay", and I understand that the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] would vote "yea."

Mr. TOWNSEND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Tennessee [Mr. McKELLAR], who is unavoidably detained from the Senate. I understand that if he were present he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea." I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce a pair on this question between the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]. If present, the Senator from Louisiana would vote "nay", and the Senator from Massachusetts would vote "yea."

Mr. LOGAN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], who is absent. Not knowing how he would vote on this question, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. Has the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS] voted?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana. I have a general pair with the Senator from Mississippi. In his absence I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. HEBERT. The Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] has a pair with the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. HARRISON]. I understand that if those Senators were present the Senator from Maine would vote "yea", and the Senator from Mississippi would vote "nay."

Mr. HARRISON (after having voted in the negative). As has just been stated, I am paired with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE]. I find, however, that I can transfer my pair with him to the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST]. I do so, and will allow my vote to stand.

Mr. HEBERT. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. AUSTIN] is paired with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN]. If present, the Senator from Vermont would vote "yea", and the Senator from Nevada would vote "nay."

The Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS] is paired with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN]. On this question the Senator from Delaware would vote "yea" and the Senator from Colorado would vote "nay."

The Senator from Vermont [Mr. DALE] is paired with the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO]. On this question I am informed that the Senator from Vermont would vote "yea" and the Senator from California would vote "nay."

The Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] is paired with the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. I am informed that on this question the Senator from Virginia would vote "yea" and the Senator from Idaho would vote "nay."

Mr. BORAH (after having voted in the negative). As announced by the Senator from Rhode Island, I have a pair with the senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. As he has not come into the Chamber and my pair should be, and has been, announced, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I could not hear altogether the announcement of the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT]. I assume, however, that the Senator from Rhode Island presented a full list of the pairs so far as our Republican colleagues are concerned.

I desire to say that the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], and the Senator from California [Mr. MCADOO] have authorized me to say that were they present and at liberty to vote on this particular question they would vote "nay."

I desire to announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is absent in attendance upon the London Economic Conference.

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] is necessarily detained from the Senate by reason of illness.

Mr. KENDRICK. I desire to announce that the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON], the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. COOLIDGE], the Senator from New York [Mr. COPELAND], the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG], the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS], the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS], and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] are necessarily absent on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 21, nays 48, as follows:

YEAS—21

Barbour	Hatfield	Metcalf	Walcott
Carey	Hebert	Patterson	White

So Mr. REED'S amendment was rejected.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the desk and ask to have stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 2, line 22, it is proposed to strike out the comma and the words "excepting currency" and to insert in lieu thereof the following:

Incurred on and after the date this resolution takes effect, excepting currency, but not including any such obligation incurred prior to such date which by its terms is payable in gold or gold coin.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, the purpose of this amendment is to make it impossible for the United States Government to repudiate past obligation with reference to gold payments. In other words, even if this joint resolution should be agreed to with this amendment on it, then the United States Government may not default with reference to gold payments on any of its Government bonds.

Mr. President, I wish in connection with this to make a carefully considered and very brief statement.

The basic provision, contained in lines 3 to 14 on page 2, reads:

Every provision which purports to give the obligee a right to require payment in gold is declared to be against public policy, and no such provision shall be contained in or made with respect to any obligation hereinafter incurred.

Assuming that what is desired is merely to displace gold from its position as a preferred form of contractual obligation, the provision quoted seems to go much too far and to place the whole proposal in an absurd light. It is not necessary to forbid the making of such contracts, and to do so would seem to be a serious infringement of the right of free contract.

The language of the joint resolution, in lines 14 to 19, page 2, seems to be a hasty catch-all provision designed to repeal gold contracts wherever specified in the laws of the United States.

I read those lines, as follows:

Any such provision contained in any law authorizing obligations to be issued by or under authority of the United States is hereby repealed, but the repeal of any such provision shall not invalidate any other provision or authority contained in such law.

This seems a careless way of bringing about a result which ought to be effected through detailed study of the statutes with a view to repealing only those things that need repeal. It is probable that this clause would repeal a great many provisions that ought not to be altered, certainly in any such way as proposed, with resultant embarrassment.

The definition of the term "obligation" to include all obligations of the United States except currency is repudiation of Government debts, and as such, needs no comment whatever.

On page 3, section 2, an amendment is provided for the last sentence of subsection B, section 43, of the act of May 12, 1933. This gives a blanket legal-tender power to all coins and currencies of the United States. This is an unwise provision, which reverses the whole tenor of our note-currency legislation for years past. It gives the legal-tender power to national-bank notes, and this is a step always resolutely opposed in the past by financial authorities of every party. It also reverses those provisions which have protected the gold revenues of the United States by withholding the legal-tender quality from various kinds of paper in the past. It is an unnecessary and gratuitous step, not called for by the requirements of the case as set forth in the resolution itself.

Mr. President, we borrow gold, and we pay our debts in paper. We borrow paper, and we pay our debts in shells. We borrow shells, and we pay our debts in pebbles. That is the inevitable degradation of a currency system when we get away from an established base. We can experiment to almost any reasonable extent with various economic laws until we touch the base of the currency. We can have a 75 or perhaps even a 50 percent batting average with the experiments along lines of price control, and a thousand other avenues in our industrial relations. But the minute we disturb contractual obligations, the foundation of our currency, we begin to flounder.

This amendment applies only to those obligations which have already been issued by the Federal Government, and I hope very much indeed that it will be agreed to, and save the United States from what I believe to be a public disgrace and an international calamity, a default.

On Mount Sinai, on a table of stone, four words were written which I think apply to our present dilemma if we fall from grace in this respect—"thou shalt not steal."

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, before the Senator takes his seat, may I ask him to explain, if he will, one phrase here? We start in the first section of the joint resolution, on page 2, with this language:

> Every provision contained in or made with respect to any obligation which purports to give the obligee a right to require payment in gold * * * is declared against public policy.

Then, in line 20, we undertake to explain what the term "obligation" means, when we say:

> As used in this resolution, the term "obligation" means an obligation (including every obligation of and to the United States, excepting currency).

What is the construction of the two words "excepting currency"?

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, my amendment is to amend this particular language, to amplify the language, and make it refer to all obligations of the United States Government already issued. I agree with the Senator that there is ambiguity in this particular item.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I will not assert any ambiguity except with myself in regard to it. It may be perfectly plain; but what is meant by "currency" there which is excepted from the definition of obligation?

Mr. WALCOTT. The only thing I can think of is that it means what it says; that is, either hard metal or gold certificates calling for payment in metal.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. WALCOTT. I yield.

Mr. REED. Our Federal Reserve notes carry on them the legend "Payable in gold on demand." They are excepted from the class of obligations which are repudiated by this joint resolution.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is exactly what I wanted to ascertain.

Mr. REED. After this joint resolution is enacted these Federal Reserve notes—I happen to have just one here in my pocket——

Mr. JOHNSON. May I have it? [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. I am afraid the Senator would be forced by this legislation to pay me back in some kind of "monkey" money, so I cannot lend it to him; but it carries these words on it:

> Redeemable in gold on demand at the United States Treasury or in gold or lawful money at any Federal Reserve bank.

We all know that that promise is broken every time such a bill is presented at the Treasury. The Government will not redeem it in gold.

Mr. JOHNSON. That is exactly what this measure says, is it not?

Mr. REED. That is what it says, yes; but that is just another promise that is going to be broken.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not construe it in that fashion. I construe this, if the Senator will pardon me, merely to mean that as to the obligations referred to it will not be permissible to pay any of them in gold, save currency.

Mr. REED. That is exactly it.

Mr. JOHNSON. May I ask the distinguished Senator from Florida, the chairman of the committee, if that is his construction of it?

Mr. FLETCHER. My construction of it is that that bill would be payable in gold, that the gold is there in reserve with which to redeem it.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then, we are making certain obligations of the Government payable in gold, and we are making certain other obligations of the Government not payable in gold. Is that correct?

Mr. FLETCHER. The currency is payable in gold.

Mr. JOHNSON. How much currency of that sort its outstanding?

Mr. REED. Something over $2,000,000,000, the last time I looked it up.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is that fairly accurate, may I ask the Senator from Florida?

Mr. FLETCHER. I should think that is accurate.

Mr. JOHNSON. Is there any good reason why, even though this particular currency bears the proviso that it is payable in gold, the distinction should be made between that currency, over two billions of which is outstanding, and the bonds which the Congress of the United States has decreed shall be payable in gold, and which the Government of the United States has decreed should be payable in gold? There may be a very good reason for the distinction. I am endeavoring to ascertain, that is all.

Mr. FLETCHER. The bonds are payable in money, and there is a gold reserve. The bonds are payable in money.

Mr. JOHNSON. But they are payable in gold.

Mr. WALCOTT. Expressly.

Mr. JOHNSON. It is expressly provided so, not only provided by the Government when it sells them but provided by us when we authorize the issuance.

Mr. FLETCHER. I will say to the Senator that there may be some future legislation with reference to this item, and this leaves the matter open so that there may be. There is to be a great Economic Conference, and we do not know just what will result from that Economic Conference. This leaves it open, so that if Congress hereafter decides to pay in bullion instead of in coined gold, it would have the right to do that. It may be, a time will come when we will cease coining these gold pieces and pay in bullion instead of the coin itself.

Mr. JOHNSON. I repeat, I am asking merely for information. Then, as I understand the Senator, the design of the joint resolution is that some things shall yet be payable in gold and some things shall not yet be payable in gold.

Mr. FLETCHER. It may be. That will be entirely a matter to be determined.

Mr. JOHNSON. Then the upshot of it is that we are going half way off the gold standard, so far as this joint resolution can take us—we have gone off it long ago—and we are remaining halfway upon the gold standard.

Mr. BULKLEY. Mr. President, is it possible that the gold promise of the Federal Reserve note is merely a promise to redeem in gold, and that if the content of the gold dollar should be reduced it could be redeemed by paying a smaller gold dollar, whereas the obligation of the bonds and of the certificates requires payment in gold of a specified standard of weight and fineness?

Mr. JOHNSON. That is, there is a contemplation in the joint resolution, then, that we will pay this currency in a smaller gold dollar. Is that it?

Mr. BULKLEY. In connection with the Thomas amendment to the farm bill, it would seem to me that would be a reasonable interpretation.

Mr. JOHNSON. This illustrates, Mr. President, the one thing in which I am interested. I am not opposed to this joint resolution, and I do not want to be opposed to it; but I do not like the idea that with a measure of this magnitude, explained as this measure has just been explained, we should hasten with such rapidity and celerity under such explanations.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator, if the Senator from Connecticut will permit me to interrupt, that this joint resolution deals with interest-bearing obligations. It does not disturb the base of the currency, so far as that item is concerned.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the remark of the Senator from California, that this measure leaves us half on the gold standard and half off the gold standard, reminds me of what the old farmer said about the mermaid: "Too much woman to fry, too much fish to hug." [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the Senator please repeat that?

Mr. GORE. No; I will not. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON. Must I be relegated to the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to enjoy the wit of the Senator from Oklahoma? [Laughter.]

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, I desire to thank the Senator from California for raising the question with reference to the currency. I still think there is ambiguity in the use of the word "currency"; and, as to his last question, I am perfectly certain that it is explained in section 2, where it is provided that—

All coins and currencies of the United States (including Federal Reserve notes and circulating notes of Federal Reserve banks and national banking associations) heretofore or hereafter coined or issued, shall be legal tender for all debts, public and private, public charges, taxes, duties, and dues, except that gold coins, when below the standard weight and limit of tolerance provided by law for the single piece, shall be legal tender only at valuation in proportion to their actual weight.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question?

Mr. WALCOTT. I yield.

Mr. REED. Will not this joint resolution as it is now explained leave us in just this position—that our bonds will be payable, not in gold, but in currency, and that when one has obtained that currency it will be payable in gold, except that nobody knows how big the gold dollar will be with which it is paid?

With that state of uncertainty, American business is expected to go ahead and recover. Is that the understanding?

Mr. WALCOTT. I think that is exactly right. It provides, "shall be legal tender only at valuation in proportion to their actual weight", referring to these pieces of metal which we are to except.

Mr. GORE. That is the law now.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, the Senator from Pennsylvania—skilled and educated upon this question, as all of us will bear testimony from his different presentations on the subject—called our attention to the Federal Reserve notes. I will ask the Senator whether he does not, in looking at the bill which he exhibited, admit that that bill provides that it shall be redeemable in gold—then some other items—and then "lawful money"? What distinction does my able friend make between "lawful money" as written in the bill and gold?

Mr. REED. The bill contains a promise that it will be paid in gold at the Treasury, or either in gold or in lawful money at any Federal Reserve bank. If one wants gold positively, he has only to go to the Treasury for it; and if the administration and the Government keep the promise, he will get the gold.

Mr. LEWIS. What does my able friend say is the meaning of the words "lawful money", if they do not mean such money as the Government has made lawful for the payment of debts?

Mr. REED. Of course, that is what they mean.

Mr. LEWIS. Then under this measure it becomes lawful money of the same value as gold.

Mr. REED. It is lawful money now.

Mr. LEWIS. Then, upon that basis, I ask my friend, since it is lawful money and the joint resolution does not make any change, where is the difference between the value of the gold and the lawful money?

Mr. REED. Just where it was in Germany. Germany issued so much lawful money that it took a million times a million marks to buy an orange, but it was still lawful money.

Mr. LEWIS. That was a squeezing process, I realize. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. But the distinction is that this is not Germany; this is the United States of America, and here is the American Treasury, while that was Germany, in the condition in which they were after the war.

Mr. REED. German credit was bad from the time she treated her promise as a scrap of paper.

Mr. LEWIS. I am anxious to impress upon my friend from Pennsylvania this thought: If the bill he carries in his pocket provides for payment in gold or some other form or fashion of lawful money, does not the promise of the Government mean that, whatever the form of the money, it is American money, and therefore redeemable in gold?

Mr. REED. Under the act of 1902, as I recall, all money of America is exchangeable for gold, and since 1878 until now there has never been any doubt in anyone's mind of the interchangeability of our different forms of money.

Mr. LEWIS. But the bill the Senator exhibited carries the same value, does it not, as the gold dollar will carry?

Mr. REED. Of course, because it is interchangeable.

Mr. LEWIS. Then, since it is interchangeable with gold, the gold does not purchase any more than the bill itself does. I understand the Senator; it is interchangeable merely to get coin; but does the gold dollar buy any more than the paper dollar?

Mr. REED. Of course it does. When it was interchangeable freely it did not, because the value was identical; but the moment we went off the gold standard, then just so soon paper money started to drop in value. Back in 1870 the paper dollar was lawful money, but it was worth only 35 cents in gold. Now we are starting on that path again.

Mr. LEWIS. This is not the America of that day; this is the America of unbounded credit, of vast gold in its Treasury, of vast resources behind it, and bonds, behind which are the security and honor of the country.

Mr. REED. Precisely.

Mr. LEWIS. We had a civil war in those days.

Mr. REED. Yes; but the Civil War was over in 1870.

Mr. LEWIS. But we were still suffering from the results of it.

Mr. REED. If the Senator will bear with me—

Mr. LEWIS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. In 3 months the gold value of our paper money has gone down 20 percent.

Mr. LEWIS. I hope the Senator will permit me to correct him. He calls attention to the fact that it has gone down in value. It has only gone down in speculation on Wall Street, in the hands of those who speculate in money, but not in its value, in its power to purchase the commodities, or in its usefulness in trade and commerce.

Mr. REED. If the Senator cares to put it in that way, all right, but we can test its value accurately by contrasting its purchasing power in gold currency today with its purchasing power 3 months ago. It is necessary now to pay 20 percent more in order to buy a Swiss franc or a French franc or an Italian lira than it was necessary to pay on the 4th of last March.

Mr. LEWIS. Why does an American have to purchase money of foreign countries which has been so greatly depreciated by virtue of their laws and their methods and systems? Our American dollar holds before the world a value equal to and in excess of foreign moneys.

Mr. REED. We have to get coffee from other lands and to pay for it in foreign money. That would seem to be fairly obvious. The same thing is true of tin and sugar and hemp and a long list of commodities which I could mention to the Senator.

Mr. LEWIS. Does not the Senator assume that we pay it by either exchange of goods or entries on books? We do not pay in gold. Am I not right about that?

Mr. REED. We did pay in gold. Until we put an embargo on gold we stood ready to pay our balances in gold at all times; but the moment we put on the embargo down started the dollar and the moment we repudiate our public debt, as we are now proposing to do, down the dollar will go further.

Mr. LEWIS. In specultation, in the hands of those who speculate in money. I ask the Senator if he wants to convey the impression that if this joint resolution shall be passed the note he has disclosed to us from his pocket, which he says is redeemable in gold or legal money, will not be redeemed according to the way in which it is written?

Mr. REED. I am sure of it. The Senator has only to go to the Treasury at the other end of Pennsylvania Avenue and ask our Government to perform its promise, and he will be laughed at.

Mr. LEWIS. Then, what do the words "lawful money" mean on the bill?

Mr. REED. The words "lawful money" are not used with regard to the Treasury. The inscription is "redeemable in gold at the Treasury", and that promise is being broken every time a bill is taken to the Treasury, although we have more gold in the Treasury today than has any other country in the world.

Mr. LEWIS. I ask the able Senator, then, if we have more gold than we have ever had before, is it not behind all this money and is not the money in proportion to the gold behind it of a gold value?

Mr. REED. Not a bit of it.

Mr. LEWIS. That is where we differ, and I think it is a fundamental difference.

Mr. REED. Because when the Government declines to part with its gold that gold might as well be at the bottom of the ocean, because, unlike any private citizen, the Government cannot be forced to meet its promise.

Mr. LEWIS. But the theory is that the promise is to be kept with lawful money.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the Senator from Illinois just remarked that America of today is not the America of the Civil War. I have here an extract from a speech delivered by Charles Sumner in this Chamber on this subject at a time when we were on a paper-money basis, when there was no gold in the country, when there was no silver in the country, and it was delivered at just about the time the Supreme Court held that a contract which by its express terms called for payment in gold coin of standard weight and fineness was an enforceable contract; indeed, the Court said it was, to all intents and purposes, a bullion contract. I desire to have read the passage from Charles Sumner's address.

Mr. LEWIS. Let me ask the Senator from Oklahoma if it was not the address in which he spoke of the money as being repudiated? Am I not right?

Mr. GORE. Yes, sir; he did.

Mr. LEWIS. Perhaps it was due to his attitude of mind toward his country at that particular time, because it sought to make some common concessions in the interest of peace.

Mr. GORE. The speech was delivered in 1868, several years after hostilities between the States had been concluded.

Mr. LEWIS. The able Senator knows that the word "reconstruction" carries with it much suggestion.

Mr. GORE. Yes; but even in that hectic and chaotic age Mr. Sumner held fast and firm to the obligation of the United States to do what it promised to do. That is all I am insisting upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the clerk will read, as requested.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

[From the Congressional Globe—Speech of Mr. Sumner in the Senate June 11, 1868]

The proposition to pay bonds in greenbacks becomes futile and fatuous when it is considered that such an operation would be nothing more than the substitution of greenbacks for bonds and not a payment of anything. The form of the debt would be changed; but the debt would remain. Of the twenty-five hundred millions which we now owe, whether in greenbacks or bonds, every dollar must be paid sooner or later or be ignobly repudiated. By paying the interest of the bonds in coin instead of greenbacks the annual increase of the debt to this extent is prevented. But the principal remains to be paid. If this be attempted in greenbacks, it will be by an issue far beyond all the demands of currency. There will be a deluge of greenbacks. The country must suffer inconceivably under such a dispensation. The interest on the bonds may be stopped by the substitution; but the currency will be depreciated infinitely beyond any such dishonest saving. The country will be bankrupt. Inconvertible paper will overspread the land to the exclusion of coin or any chance of coin for some time to come. Farewell, then, to specie payments. Greenbacks will be everywhere. The multitudinous mice that swam the Rhine and devoured Bishop Hatto in his tower were not more destructive. The cloud of locusts described by Milton as "warping on the eastern wind" and "darkening all the land of Nile" were not more pestilential.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, it seems to me that some Senators confuse names and things. The word "dollar" they confuse with the thing, the intrinsic worth embodied in that dollar. The discharge of one promise to pay with another promise to pay is not payment.

I think I can illustrate this by a parable or a fable. I agreed to deliver to a market man in this city on yesterday 100 dozen eggs. I tendered 100 dozen as fine eggshells as any cook ever saw. The market man was a little punctilious. He refused to accept the eggshells as eggs. He now insists upon my paying the eggs instead of shells; and I want, therefore, to amend this measure or the Agricultural Relief Act by providing that my shells shall be immediately tenderable in payment of eggs. [Laughter.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT].

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I am not disposed to detain the Senate unduly by a discussion of the pending measure; but I cannot bring myself to vote upon it without saying something regarding what I consider to be a dishonor to the Nation, if this proposed act shall become a law.

The discussion up to this point appears to have proceeded upon the theory that the pending joint resolution affects only Government obligations; at any rate, the discussion has been limited to its effect upon obligations issued by the Government of the United States. Of course, it is much more far-reaching than that, as Senators may readily observe from a reading of its provisions. Let me quote a very few lines from section 1, beginning in line 3, on page 2, as follows:

That (a) every provision contained in or made with respect to any obligation which purports to give the obligee a right to require payment in gold or a particular kind of coin or currency, or in an amount in money of the United States measured thereby, is declared to be against public policy.

That, Mr. President, means, of course, that this proposed law will apply not only to the obligations issued by the United States Government but it will apply to the obligations payable in gold issued by every corporation, by every individual, by every citizen of the United States and outstanding at the present time. So, not only is the Government going to debase its own honor but it is going to put its citizens in the position of doing that very same thing. I venture to say that no man within the sound of my voice, no man who sits as a Member of this august body, would ever be willing to take advantage of the provisions of this measure in settling his obligations with his fellow men.

As I have had occasion to meet with the citizens of my State, I have repeatedly gloried in the fact that our Government has always done honor to its obligations. I have repeatedly called the attention of the citizens of my State to what has occurred in the countries of Europe, those countries where there has been a revaluation of the money. I have called attention to the fact that the Government of France has revalued its franc so that at the present time it is worth, and for some years past it has been worth but 4 cents, whereas formerly it was worth 20 cents compared with our money, and what that revaluation meant to the citizens of that country, losing, as they did, four fifths of that which they had been able to set aside for a rainy day or for the future. I have frequently called attention to what occurred in Italy, where the lira had been revalued so that it is now worth 5 cents, in view of its former value of 20 cents, and what that has meant to the citizens of that country; that through all these changes abroad the Government of the United States has maintained the dollar, and that it was still worth 100 cents everywhere. I regret, if this measure becomes a law, that I shall have to take back what I have said so often in the presence of the citizens of my State, because it will no longer be true.

What is going to happen to those obligations issued not only by the Government of the United States but by corporations, by individuals perhaps domiciled in this country and sold abroad? Are they going to be permitted to dishonor their credit? Are they going to be permitted to say they refuse to honor their solemn promises to pay their obligations in accordance with their terms? Really, if the pending joint resolution becomes a law, that is going to be a way open to them.

That will not be the end of the matter either. I said a moment ago that the Governments of France and Italy and of other countries of Europe have revalued their moneys. If now we are to provide a different means of settling our obligations, what is going to happen when we come to demand the payment of our war debts, which this Congress has repeatedly said shall not be canceled? Both great political parties and the candidates of both parties have repeatedly promised their constituents that under no circumstances would those debts be canceled. If the measure becomes a law, then why cannot the people of France say to the Government of the United States, "We have revalued our franc. You have revalued your dollar, in effect. We will pay you on the basis of our revaluation, just as you are paying your obligations to us on the basis of your revaluation."

Italy might well say, when she comes to pay her obligations to the United States, "When we made our promise to you the lira was worth 20 cents in your money. At that time your dollar was worth 100 cents. Now, however, there has been a revaluation of your dollar, just as there has been a revaluation of our lira, and we shall pay you our obligation on the basis of our revalued money, just as you are paying your obligations to us on the basis of your revalued money."

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. HEBERT. I yield.

Mr. GORE. The measure authorizes the payment of obligations in paper money or any money designated in the measure, including, as I understand it, nickels and copper pennies. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEBERT. Mr. President, I am not unmindful of the solemn statement made by the candidates of both parties for the high office of President of the country during the last campaign. We were assured on every hand that we should continue to have a sound currency. We were assured that there was no danger of our going off the gold standard. We were assured that the value of our money would be held up to par, as it had always been throughout the years. But when we are asked to pass a measure like this I hesitate to think what must have been in the minds of the candidates of the party now in power when they were making those statements to the electorate of the country.

I can see absolutely no objection, as a matter of policy, to providing that as to obligations to be issued in the future they shall not contain a provision making them payable in gold. I can well understand, as a matter of policy, that we could go along with such a provision of law. But as to the obligations now existing—obligations solemnly entered into between the parties, the conditions of which were known to all who would learn—I cannot see the wisdom, I cannot see the justice, I cannot see the equity of passing a measure which would change the conditions of such obligations at this time.

Mr. President, it is tantamount to changing the rules in the middle of the game. We heard a reference to that during the last campaign. That is not American. It is not good sportsmanship. Above all, it is not honorable.

I do wish that this administration should be willing to reconsider its determination to foist upon the country any such measure as we are considering at this time.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, I do not want to misunderstand the position or the statement made a few moments ago by the Senator from Pennsylvania. May I ask the Senator from Pennsylvania if I am right in assuming that he presents the thought that if the joint resolution which is now pending is passed, the provision authorizing gold to be taken from the Treasury would end and have no value?

Mr. REED. No; this particular type of promise is excepted from the bill. The measure declares it to be against the public policy for the gold clause to have been in bonds in the past, but excepts currency from that provision.

Mr. LEWIS. Does the Senator contend that if the amendment tendered by the able Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT], asking that currency be stricken out, were agreed to, then the currency could not be paid in gold?

Mr. REED. That would be repudiated, too. As a matter of fact, it has already been repudiated by the Treasury.

Mr. LEWIS. I think I see there is really no difference.

Mr. REED. No; there is not the slightest difference.

If the Senator will pardon me for speaking in his time, I may say to the Senator from Illinois that the pending measure declares it to be against public policy for our Government to have made the promise that it made in my paper dollar in pursuance of law then existing. The law at the present moment requires our bonds to be payable in gold of the standard of value existing at the time of their issue. The pending measure declares that that law was against public policy. It repudiates our solemn promise, just as it violates the solemn assurance which Mr. Roosevelt gave on the eve of his election last November.

Mr. WHEELER. Mr. President, I desire to invite attention to statements repeatedly made on the floor of the Senate that if the joint resolution is passed, it means that our dollar will no longer be worth 100 cents. Of course, our dollar is going to be worth 100 cents, regardless of whether the joint resolution passes or whether it does not pass. Senators have repeated again and again that the dollar is not going to be worth 100 cents, and that we are not keeping our dollar at par.

What is par for a dollar, and when is a dollar worth 100 cents? Our dollar is at par when it has the same purchasing power in one year that it has in another. Senators on the other side of the Chamber are contending that we are repudiating because of the fact that we are intending to raise commodity prices in comparison with the gold dollar. The gold dollar formerly purchased less commodities than it does now. In 1926 it purchased much less than it does at the present time. At the present time, notwithstanding the fact that commodity prices have risen, the gold dollar is much higher than it was in 1926 or 1928. The value of the dollar is a relative thing compared with commodities throughout the world.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] talks about repudiation, and about the American dollar going down in value. I invite attention to the fact that at the present time it is much higher, and has much greater purchasing power, in this country or in any other country, than it had in 1926. The reason why it has gone down in purchasing power in European countries at the present time is not that our dollar has depreciated so much as because of the fact that foreign currencies have depreciated to such an extent that they were completely putting us out of the world market. I have called attention to the fact that what we have done by keeping our country constantly upon the gold standard, and keeping our dollar higher, has been to depreciate the price of silver. What we were doing was to build up the industries of China and India and Japan; and every time we did anything to build up those industries we were putting men on the streets in the United States of America.

When England went off the gold standard, and when she depreciated her currency 30 percent, what did it mean to Great Britain? It meant that instead of her people continuing to be unemployed, they began to go back to work and be employed—just exactly the same thing that happened in this country when there was talk of our going off the gold standard. Immediately commodity prices began to rise.

The Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] today talked about labor, and how labor was affected by reason of the fact that commodity prices have gone up. Did the Senator from Pennsylvania, or anybody on the other side of the Chamber, complain when the United States Steel Corporation and every other great corporation in this country slashed wages by reason of the high-priced dollar, and because of the fact that they were unable to sell their commodities abroad? Not at all. The high-priced dollar compelled all of the great corporations and industrial organizations in the United States to cut wages and throw people out of employment.

Let me say to the Senate that there is only one way in which wages can be kept high, and that is by having a market for the work of the men. In other words, it does not make any difference how many labor organizations there are; if there is not work for the men, wages are going down.

This bill, in my judgment, is not going to have the disastrous effect which has been predicted for it on the floor by the opposition. I am convinced that we had to take this stand. We are not repudiating our debts. We are doing simply what the Constitution of the United States gives us the right to do. That is, we are going to lower the purchasing power of the dollar. In my judgment, that will help to bring back prosperity to the United States of America. It seems to me that the people who are contending that we should keep our present high-priced dollar are doing a disservice to this country, and are only helping the industrialists of other countries.

Without taking up any more of the time of the Senate, I submit that this joint resolution should pass.

Before sitting down, however, since so much has been said about gold, I desire to call attention to a very brilliant speech made by Mr. Ingalls, United States Senator from Kansas, on February 15, 1878. Mr. Ingalls was one of the outstanding Members of this body. On the subject of gold, he said:

If we are to have a monometallic standard, I believe silver to be immediately preferable to gold. It is less subject to fluctuation; its production is more steady; its cost more uniform.

No enduring fabric of national prosperity can be builded on gold.

GOLD IS THE MONEY OF MONARCHS

Kings covet it; the exchanges of nations are effected by it. Its tendency is to accumulate in vast masses in the commercial centers, and to move from kingdom to kingdom in such volumes as to unsettle values and disturb the finances of the world. It is the instrument of gamblers and speculators, and the idol of the miser and the thief. Being the object of so much adoration, it becomes haughty and sensitive and shrinks at the approach of danger, and whenever it is most needed it always disappears. At the slightest alarm it begins to look for a refuge. It flies from the nation at war to the nation at peace. War makes it a fugitive. No people in a great emergency ever found a faithful ally in gold. It is the most cowardly and treacherous of all metals. It makes no treaty that it does not break. It has no friend whom it does not sooner or later betray. Armies and navies are not maintained by gold. In times of panic and calamity, shipwreck and disaster, it becomes the chief agent and minister of ruin. No nation ever fought a great war by the aid of gold.

I call attention to the fact that during the last war it became necessary for practically every country to go off the gold standard.

On the contrary, in the crisis of greatest peril it becomes an enemy more potent than the foe in the field; but when the battle is won and peace has been secured, gold reappears and claims the fruits of victory. In our own Civil War it is doubtful if the gold of New York and London did not work us greater injury than the power and lead and iron of the rebels. It was the most invincible enemy of the public credit. Gold paid no soldier nor sailor. It refused the national obligations. It was worth most when our fortunes were lowest. Every defeat gave it increased value. It was in open alliance with our enemies the world over, and all its energies were evoked for our destruction. But, as usual, when danger has been averted and the victory secured, and asserts the supremacy.

GOLD SWAGGERS TO THE FRONT

* * * * * * *

Bank notes were originally issued in amounts precisely equal to the representative value of the gold and silver in the vaults, and they were intended merely to preserve the metals from loss by abrasion from use and from the depredations of thieves. But gradually they were issued largely in excess of this in order to release for more remunerative purposes a greater amount of productive capital. If by any process all business were compelled to be transacted on a coin basis, and actual specie payments should be enforced, the whole civilized world would be bankrupt before sunset. There is not coin enough in existence to meet in specie one-thousandth part of the commercial obligations of mankind. Specie payments, as an actual fact, neither in gold nor silver, in January 1879, nor at any other date, here nor elsewhere. The pretense that they will be is either dishonest or delusive.

WILL NEVER BE RESUMED

The American people have no special reverence for coin. They believe that all money, whether of metal or paper, is a creation of law and has precisely the value that the Government issuing it declares it shall possess. The creation of money is a power delegated to Congress by the people. Its unit must necessarily be arbitrary, and its value rests upon the consent of the Nation. The relative value of silver and gold to each other as compared with other commodities cannot be ascertained. It is affected by a thousand circumstances that operate every day and hour.

I likewise desire to call attention to a statement which was made upon this subject by Mr. Ingalls in which he quotes from two London papers. He says:

The act of February 25, 1862, authorizing the issue of 5.20 bonds, provides that the interest shall be paid

NOT IN GOLD, BUT COIN

That act also provides that duties on imports shall be paid not in gold, but in coin. The same act created the sinking fund, payable not in gold, but coin.

The act of February 17, 1862, makes its obligations payable not in gold, but coin.

The act of July 11, 1862, makes its obligations payable not in gold, but coin.

The act of March 3, 1863, providing for the issue of $900,000,000, makes them payable not in gold, but coin.

The act of March 3, 1864, for a loan of $200,000,000, makes it payable not in gold, but coin.

The act of June 30, 1864, to borrow $400,000,000, makes it payable not in gold, but coin.

The act of March 3, 1865, for $600,000,000, makes them payable in "coin or other lawful money"; not gold, but coin or greenbacks.

The act of March 18, 1869, "An act to strengthen the public credit", "to remove any doubt as to the purpose of the Government to discharge all just obligations to the public creditors, and to settle conflicting questions and interpretations of the laws by which such obligations have been contracted", solemnly pledges "the faith of the United States" "to the payment" "of all the obligations of the United States not bearing interest, known as United States notes", "in coin or its equivalent", and of all interest-bearing obligations of the United States, except in cases where the law authorizing the issue of any such obligation has expressly provided that the same may be paid in lawful money or other currency than gold and silver.

All our debt is payable in coin. Silver was legal coin when the debt was contracted. Therefore

THE DEBT IS PAYABLE IN SILVER

The odious cant about repudiation and dishonor is a knavish device to intimidate a people who have always respected their obligations. The great journals of Europe entertain no such opinions. The London Times recently said: "It could in no sense be called repudiation if silver were made the sole standard of the United States tomorrow." The London Economist, the special organ of British financial opinions, in speaking of the same subject uses the following language:

"If, at the present moment, America would become a silver country, the interest and principal of her obligations would be paid in silver. The evil, of course, would not be what the momentary circumstances of the market would now suggest. Silver would not be at 54 pence per ounce if America was a country with a sole silver currency. So large a demand as her coin requirements would send up the price very rapidly—perhaps to its old amount."

There can be no doubt of the constitutional authority of Congress to create a silver-dollar unit containing any number of grains greater or less than 412½. The only question to be determined is, What shall the weight of the dollar be? I am clearly of opinion that while the dollar of 412½ grains is required by the terms of our contract, it will be

TOO VALUABLE FOR DOMESTIC USES

One of the gold organs of New York says:

"It was the fact that in these countries—that is, the states of the Latin union—15½ ounces of silver could be exchanged for 1 of gold that caused our dollar of 412½ grains to be exported as fast as it was coined, as that coin was based upon 16 to 1, and was, therefore, worth 3 percent more in Europe than at home; and if silver should recover its lost value and be remonetized on the basis of 412½ grains, it would for the same reason be impossible to keep it in the country."

But even this condition of affairs will not be without its consolations. The advocates of gold have endeavored to leave the impression that this drainage of silver would be like blood spilled upon the ground to be drunk by the thirsty sands. But if silver goes abroad it will travel as merchandise and not as money. At the distance of three marine leagues from the shore it becomes commodity, and will sell for what it is actually worth in the land to which it goes, and it will send back gold, bonds, silk, wine, cutlery, broadcloth to the land from whence it came.

The issue of silver will also tend to remedy the evils which have resulted not by operation of law alone, but by those great natural causes which are apparent to the most casual scrutiny.

When we talked about the remonetization of silver in this body, the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. REED] and others upon the other side of the Chamber said that that would be a repudiation of our gold contracts. When we talk now about paying them in the lawful money of the United States, they say that is repudiation, notwithstanding the fact that the Senator from Ohio [Mr. FESS] today said that, of course, these contracts would never be paid in gold.

No one expects them to be paid in gold. The Senator from Ohio knows that these bonds will not be paid in gold, and nobody expects them to be. The holders only expect them to be paid in the lawful currency of the United States, and whether that currency is worth a lot or whether it is worth little does not depend upon the amount of gold that we have in the Treasury of the United States. It depends almost entirely upon the faith of the people of the United States in our going out and collecting taxes to pay our debts and to take care of our obligations. That is what it depends upon and not upon the amount of gold.

To my way of thinking, Mr. President, this joint resolution will have little, if any, effect excepting to assist the President of the United States at the World Economic Conference in settling the exchange question, which is bound to come up early on the agenda of that conference.

Mr. WALCOTT. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. McNARY. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). On this vote I have a pair with the senior Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE], which I transfer to the senior Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], and vote "nay." I am advised that if present the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] would vote "yea."

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Davis], who is absent. I therefore withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. FRAZIER (when Mr. NYE's name was called). On this question my colleague [Mr. NYE] has a pair with the senior Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS]. If my colleague were present, he would vote "nay", and I understand that if the Senator from Maryland [Mr. TYDINGS] were present he would vote "yea."

Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana (when his name was called). In the absence of the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS], with whom I have a general pair, I withhold my vote.

If present and voting, Mr. AUSTIN, Mr. HASTINGS, Mr. DALE, Mr. TOWNSEND, and Mr. GLASS would vote in the affirmative, and Mr. PITTMAN, Mr. COSTIGAN, Mr. McADOO, Mr. McKELLAR, and Mr. BORAH would vote in the negative.

Mr. LEWIS. I desire to announce that if present the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] would vote "yea", and the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG] would vote "nay."

I also desire to announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] is en route to attend the London Economic Conference.

I wish to announce that the Senator from Colorado [Mr. COSTIGAN] is detained from the Senate by illness.

So, Mr. WALCOTT's amendment was rejected.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee, the Senator from Florida [Mr. FLETCHER], and of the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON].

In my State one of our corporations is refinancing to a considerable extent. The bonds have been printed; and, of course, not knowing that this measure was coming on, those bonds have been printed in the usual terms, payable in gold of the present weight and fineness.

I do not desire to disturb or modify the joint resolution, but I do desire to submit for the consideration of the Senator in charge of the bill and to the senior Senator from Arkansas and others an amendment which will permit this refinancing to go ahead without disturbance.

On page 2, in line 9, we find a prohibition against refinancing if the refinancing bonds contain the gold clause. I submit an amendment to the effect that this shall not be a prohibition until 15 days from the date of the approval of the joint resolution. It does not in any sense change the joint resolution, and the only possible objection to it would be that perhaps the administration desires to have the joint resolution go into effect immediately.

If the House would agree to this amendment, which does not change the joint resolution, it would take care of the refinancing of a substantial amount in my State, and would not in any sense change the form of the pending measure.

Of course, after this measure is enacted, if the company to which I have referred should issue these gold bonds, the joint resolution provides that they can be payable in currency, in lawful money, and, of course, the company would understand that, and that would be no bar.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, the trouble is that if there is an amendment put on this joint resolution in the Senate it will have to go back to the House. The House is not in session now, and I do not know when the House might take it up. The House might agree to it, or it might not, and if it did not, the matter would have to go to conference, and it might be several days before the joint resolution could be enacted.

I wish very much the Senator would not offer the amendment. If any amendment shall be made to the joint resolution, I do not see how we can accomplish what the Treasury says is absolutely necessary to the proper conduct of the financial affairs of the Government through the enactment of this measure now.

Any amendment would require that the measure go back to the House. On that account I hope the Senator will not offer the amendment. I should have to oppose it; and under the circumstances I think it is very important to the country at large, to all our people, and certainly it is important in the conduct of our financial affairs by the Treasury, that we act on the joint resolution now and pass it without amendment, without making it necessary to send it back to the House.

I might suggest to the Senator that all the company to which he has referred would have to do would be to reprint the bonds, and that would be better than to delay the joint resolution.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the Senator also addressed his remarks to me. I merely desire to say that I am constrained to agree in the statement made by the Senator from Florida. I hope the Senator from Oklahoma will not feel compelled to offer the amendment.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I realize that in the face of the objection of the Chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency, in charge of the pending measure, and the objection of the senior Senator from Arkansas, my amendment would probably not be agreed to; but I felt it necessary to present this amendment in order to attempt to protect a situation which will be very embarrassing to a substantial concern in my State.

In order that the record may be made, I desire to submit the amendment and have it placed in the RECORD.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the amendment will be printed in the RECORD.

The amendment was as follows: On page 2, in line 9, to strike out the word "hereafter", and after the word "incurred", to strike out the period and to insert the words "at a time more than 15 days after the date of the approval of this joint resolution."

Mr. SCHALL. Mr. President, it seems to me that there are four problems to consider in the joint resolution before us, each in a different field of study, economics, morality, legality, and psychology.

The question of economics arises from the relative positions of debtors and creditors and as to which class should bear the burden of loss due to a change in value of the medium of exchange.

Morals are concerned with the issue arising from a congressional fiat that declares that a dollar labeled such on paper shall have the same value as has a gold dollar of the present weight and fineness. Such is not the case in practice, for we need only look at the foreign exchanges to know that already our paper dollars are worth only 85 cents. We are now trying by law to tell the American people that that is not so, and that either one, gold or paper, is worth the same.

The legality of the retroactive clause in this resolution is in doubt, but likely unconstitutional in accordance with the view taken by the United States Supreme Court in the case of Bronson v. Rodes (7 Wallace, 229), where the Court ordered payment in the metal where there existed a disparity between metal and paper.

The fourth element, that of psychology, seems to me to be equally persuasive in leading me to believe that the proper thing to do here is to vote against this resolution.

We confess here we are unable to pay our debts according to our contractual agreements. We have more gold now than we had when we entered into these contractual obligations, and yet we say we cannot pay as we agreed. We offer instead paper money, as that is just as good—so Congress says, because it has the power to say so.

What possible effect can this declaration have on the mind of the people of the country? This is the same position as was recently taken by the banks when they told their depositors they did not have the money and needed a moratorium. With the banks closed, business stopped and we reached the bottom of the depression. Bank credit having been taken out of our financial structure, values fell to the lowest level since the so-called "hard times" began. To reestablish confidence in our banks the Government now has to guarantee bank deposits. We cannot survive as a Nation without the use of banks.

Now we proceed to destroy confidence in our money, our currency, by saying that we have not enough gold back of it to pay as agreed, so we insist on handing our creditors paper money. This declaration will cause people to "run from the dollar" to spend their money in commodities, causing an artificial stimulus to business, higher prices as the money depreciates, and finally destruction of value of money and a collapse of the price structure. This is the result history proves in each instance to follow. Russia right now by legislative fiat says that her rubles are worth two for a dollar; she knows that across her border they are buying five or six or more for a dollar.

We are setting out to make a similar attempt by destroying the faith of the American dollar when we say we will not redeem in gold, and history has not failed to demonstrate the same conclusion in each instance, a collapse of values and a destruction of confidence in the national currency.

The integrity of the American dollar has never been questioned in our memory; let us not leave to our descendants a blemish on that faith.

I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an item from the New York Times of May 28, 1933, written by Mr. W. B. Sheppard, of Denver, Colo., in regard to the subject which I have been discussing.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times, May 28, 1933]

STABLE CURRENCY FOUND ESSENTIAL—FLUCTUATIONS IN VALUE HIT ALL CLASSES IN THIS COUNTRY

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

"The origin of legal tender among English-speaking people", said Edward Atkinson, "was the decree of an English king making it a penal offense to refuse the king's money after he had debased it."

In this country the validity of this doctrine was first asserted by the Legal Tender Act of February 1862, which made greenbacks "a legal tender in payment of all debts, public and private, except duties on imports and interest on the public debt." This legislation, frankly a war measure, was held by the United States Supreme Court, 5 to 3, in 1870 (Hepburn v. Griswold, 8 Wallace, 603), not to govern contracts entered into prior to its enactment. In 1871 two vacancies on this bench were filled by the appointment of Justices Strong and Bradley; 2 days after the confirmation of the latter the Attorney General moved for a reconsideration; and a few months later Hepburn v. Griswold was formally overruled as to prior contracts. In 1833 this Court held (Juillard v. Greenman, 110 U.S. 421) that Congress possessed the prerogative of declaring any old thing a legal tender for all debts payable in dollars, no matter when contracted.

Since 1883, in this country, most long-term obligations have contained stipulation for payment in "gold coin of the present standard of weight and fineness." In 1868 this Court had held (Bronson v. Rodes, 7 Wallace, 229) that such contracts are enforceable. And this distinction between real and fiat money was recognized in the words of the act of May 1878, "unless otherwise expressly stated in the contract."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the third reading of the joint resolution.

The joint resolution was ordered to a third reading, and was read the third time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is, Shall the joint resolution pass?

Mr. REED and other Senators asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the legislative clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HARRISON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement of the transfer of my pair with the Senator from Maine [Mr. HALE] to the Senator from Arizona [Mr. ASHURST], I vote "yea." The Senator from Maine, if present, would, I am advised, vote "nay."

The Senator from Louisiana desires it especially announced that if present he would vote "yea." I understand that if present the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] would vote "nay", while the other Democratic Senators whose names I have mentioned, if present, would vote "yea." I am so authorized to announce.

So the joint resolution was passed.

The preamble was agreed to.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I ask that Senate Joint Resolution 56 may be indefinitely postponed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, before that action is taken, I wish to ask a question. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the Senator from Florida what it is that he asked be indefinitely postponed?

Mr. FLETCHER. It is a Senate joint resolution similar to the House joint resolution which has just been passed, the Senate resolution having been submitted by me and referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported back and placed on the calendar. Meantime the House passed a similar joint resolution on the same subject, and the Senate has considered and passed the House joint resolution.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well; I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, Senate Joint Resolution 56 will be indefinitely postponed.

RELIEF OF HOME OWNERS

Mr. BULKLEY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 5240.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold that motion for a moment?

Mr. BULKLEY. I withhold it.

Mr. HARRISON. May I ask the Senator if his bill shall be taken up, will he not permit me on Monday to submit a conference report on the electric-energy tax at some time that is agreeable?

Mr. BULKLEY. I shall have no objection to that being done.

Mr. HARRISON. Very well.

OHIO RIVER BRIDGE AT OWENSBORO, KY.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator withhold the motion for a moment?

Mr. BULKLEY. I withhold the motion.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, in 3 or 4 days the time will expire within which the State Highway Commission of Kentucky may commence the construction of a bridge at Owensboro, Ky. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on Commerce may be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 1815) to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Owensboro, Ky., and that the bill may be considered and acted upon at this time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the Senator from Kentucky how much time has the company within which to commence the building of the bridge?

Mr. BARKLEY. It is a bridge to be constructed by the State Highway Commission of the State of Kentucky. A good deal of preliminary work has been done, but the time will expire now in 4 or 5 days.

Mr. NORRIS. Has there been a bill for the construction of the bridge passed heretofore?

Mr. BARKLEY. A bill has heretofore been passed giving them the right to build the bridge, but the time under that bill is about to expire.

Mr. NORRIS. When was that bill passed? How much time have they had?

Mr. BARKLEY. They have had a year, but, of course, the conditions for financing have been adverse, and it is desired that the permit be renewed. It is a matter in which the State Highway Commission of Kentucky is vitally concerned.

Mr. NORRIS. Over what river will the bridge be built?

Mr. BARKLEY. The bridge will be built over the Ohio River at Owensboro, Ky., connecting Kentucky and Indiana. It is all right, I will say to the Senator.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Kentucky is not this the same bridge bill which was reported from the subcommittee last year, over which I was the presiding chairman?

Mr. BARKLEY. The bill was reported from the Committee on Commerce during the last Congress and was passed by Congress.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I recall it very well.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if the bill passed last year, what is the necessity for the bill now?

Mr. BARKLEY. It was passed during the last Congress and the time provided in that bill is about to expire and will expire next week.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to ask what provisions are in this bill we are about to take up in regard to tolls? Tolls are provided for, are they?

Mr. BARKLEY. Under the laws of Kentucky the State highway commission has authority to build toll bridges, to pay for the construction of the bridges out of the tolls, and to issue bonds with which to obtain the money to build the bridges. This bill simply provides an extension of time under the original act passed by Congress.

Mr. NORRIS. Under the proposed statute, will the time come when the bridge will be free?

Mr. BARKLEY. Absolutely. Under our law when the tolls have paid for the bridge the bridge automatically becomes free.

Mr. NORRIS. I presume this bill follows the regular formula that the committee has prescribed?

Mr. BARKLEY. There is a formula prescribed by the committee, and that formula was complied with in the passage of the original act. This bill merely extends the time within which the bridge may be commenced under the terms of the original act.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, as I understand, it is not a new measure for the building of the bridge?

Mr. BARKLEY. No.

Mr. NORRIS. But it simply extends the time for building the bridge provided in the original act?

Mr. BARKLEY. That is correct.

Mr. NORRIS. I think I have no objection, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kentucky asks unanimous consent that the Committee on Commerce be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill 1815. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the Committee on Commerce is discharged from the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. BARKLEY. I now ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill.

There being no objection, the bill was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Ohio River at or near Owensboro, Ky., authorized to be built by the State Highway Commission of Kentucky by an act of Congress approved June 9, 1932, are hereby extended 1 and 3 years, respectively, from June 9, 1933.

SEC. 2. The right to alter, amend, or repeal this act is hereby expressly reserved.

RELIEF OF HOME OWNERS

Mr. BULKLEY. I ask for a vote on my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 5240.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill (H.R. 5240) to provide emergency relief with respect to home-mortgage indebtedness, to refinance home mortgages, to extend relief to the owners of homes occupied by them and who are unable to amortize their debt elsewhere, to amend the Federal Home Loan Bank Act, to increase the market for obligations of the United States, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Banking and Currency with amendments.

RECEPTION AND REFERENCE OF EXECUTIVE NOMINATIONS

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, it is necessary to have a brief executive session. Pending that question, I ask unanimous consent that if executive nominations shall be sent to the Senate before the hour of 7 o'clock this evening and the Senate shall not be in session the Secretary may receive and the Vice President may refer the nominations.

Mr. McNARY. Will the Senator briefly state the reason for the request?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I have been advised that the messenger is on his way from the White House with sundry nominations.

Mr. McNARY. The Senator simply wants authority to have the nominations referred to the appropriate committees?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Yes; and to prevent the necessity for holding the Senate in session, the President having requested the nominations be received today.

Mr. McNARY. I have no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. THOMAS of Utah in the chair) laid before the Senate several messages from the President of the United States submitting nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

THE CALENDAR

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Reports of committees are in order. If there be no reports of committees, the calendar is in order.

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of Thomas Hewes, of Connecticut, to be Assistant Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, on the last occasion an executive session was held, the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. COUZENS], a member of the Finance Committee, asked that the nominee, Mr. Hewes, be requested to appear before the Finance Committee, and the Senator stated, as appears in the RECORD, that he was giving me certain correspondence which he had concerning Mr. Hewes. A subcommittee of the Committee on Finance was appointed to hear Mr. Hewes, that subcommittee consisting of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GEORGE], the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. LONERGAN], and myself.

We conferred with Mr. Hewes briefly this afternoon. I directed his attention to some of the matters contained in the correspondence which the senior Senator from Michigan had placed in my hands, and Mr. Hewes very satisfactorily, so far as I was concerned, explained the points which have been raised in this correspondence. Therefore, so far as I am concerned, I have no objection to the nomination being confirmed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

COMMISSIONER OF EDUCATION

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of George F. Zook, of Ohio, to be Commissioner of Education, Department of the Interior.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmd.

THE ARMY

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read sundry nominations for promotions in the Regular Army.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I ask unanimous consent that nominations for promotions in the Regular Army be confirmed en bloc.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nominations are confirmed en bloc.

OFFICERS' RESERVE CORPS

The Chief Clerk read the nomination of James Sumner Jones to be brigadier general, Adjutant General's Department Reserve.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the nomination is confirmed.

That completes the calendar.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, JUNE 3, 1933

The House met at 11 o'clock a.m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Eternal God, our Father, through all the past years we have been abundantly helped and succored by divine care. May we have the deepest gratitude for Thy abounding mercy and goodness, and may these lead us to repentence and not selfishness. As we lift our thoughts, our yearnings, and our petitions to Thee, open Thy heart, O Father, and let Thy blessing flow as from the rock with the cleansing streams. As we have been taught that Thou art the ruler of heaven and earth, O give us conscious power, wisdom, and goodness, and make us all wiser than our own understanding. We would submit ourselves to Thy guidance. We rejoice in the coming of that glory in which shall be revealed the unrealized and the unseen; then our souls shall break forth into resounding joy, thanksgiving, and praise. We thank Thee. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

FITZSIMONS ARMY HOSPITAL, DENVER, COLO.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein a letter addressed to the Director of the Budget.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. LEWIS of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter to the Director of the Budget and Memoranda showing why the hospital should not be abolished:

ROOM 404, HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING,
Washington, D.C., May 10, 1933.

Hon. LEWIS W. DOUGLAS,
Director of the Budget, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. DOUGLAS: Pursuant to our recent conversation, I herewith submit memorandum, with schedules attached, concerning Fitzsimons Army Hospital at Denver, Colo., including a statement of reasons why it should not be abandoned.

Very truly yours,

LAWRENCE LEWIS,
Representative, First (Denver) District of Colorado.

MEMORANDUM CONCERNING FITZSIMONS ARMY HOSPITAL AT DENVER, COLO.

As a part of the economy program, the Surgeon General of the United States Army proposes to close Fitzsimons Hospital, to return all Veterans' Administration cases to veterans' hospitals, and to distribute the Army and Navy patients to hospitals in localities less favorable for the treatment of tuberculosis than is that in which Fitzsimons is situated.

I. Economy demands retention of Fitzsimons Hospital (see schedule 1).

II. Conservation of Government's $4,000,000 investment demands retention of Fitzsimons Hospital (see schedule 2).

III. Perfection of technique and success in treatment of tuberculosis demands retention of Fitzsimons Hospital (see schedule 3).

IV. Recognition by both Army and Navy of superiority in treatment of tuberculosis demands retention of Fitzsimons Hospital (see schedule 4).

V. Eminent medical specialists on tuberculosis urge retention of Fitzsimons Hospital (see schedule 5).

VI. Military preparedness demands retention of Fitzsimons Hospital (see schedule 6).

VII. Considerations of humanity demand retention of Fitzsimons Hospital (see schedule 7).

RECOMMENDATION

That Fitzsimons Hospital be continued as an Army hospital to which shall be admitted tuberculosis patients of the Army, Navy, Veterans' Administration, and Public Health Service, each department to contribute to cost of operation. This will afford to all Government patients the advantages of a personnel carefully selected throughout 16 years and a technique in the treatment of tuberculosis of extraordinary success in returning patients to civil usefulness, thus effecting economy in money and property, health, and human lives.

SCHEDULE 1. ECONOMY DEMANDS RETENTION OF FITZSIMONS HOSPITAL

The proposal to close Fitzsimons Hospital, to put all Veterans' Administration cases in veterans' hospitals, and to distribute the Army and Navy patients to hospitals in localities less favorable to the treatment of tuberculosis, will not result in a pecuniary saving to the United States Government.

The official figures demonstrate that the treatment of tuberculosis at Fitzsimons costs the Government less than at any other Government hospital, as shown by the following figures of per diem per patient:

At Fitzsimons Hospital (official figures furnished on request by Surgeon General Patterson of the Army)	$4.41
At veterans' hospitals (report of Veterans' Administration for 1932, p. 25)	4.83
For the 6 months ending Dec. 31, 1932, the Army charged Veterans' Administration for its tuberculosis patients at Fitzsimons (official figures furnished on request by Surgeon General Patterson of the Army)	4.11

The continuance of Fitzsimons Hospital at Denver, Colo., as an Army hospital, is justified by economy as demonstrated by official per diem costs at all Army hospitals as compared to Fitzsimons. (Figures given as of Dec. 31, 1932, furnished on request by Surgeon General Patterson of the Army.)

At Fitzsimons, Denver, $4.41; Letterman, San Francisco, $4.44, or 3 cents more; William Beaumont, El Paso, $4.49, or 8 cents more; Walter Reed, Washington, D.C., $5.26, or 85 cents more.

The showing of Fitzsimons is especially commendable in view of the fact that it has the largest percentage of tuberculosis cases which are the most expensive to treat, and this is true although the hospital has been operating at only 50 percent capacity. The Veterans' Administration costs for tuberculosis cases is $4.83 per diem (report of Veterans' Administration, 1932, p. 25).

The annual cost of maintaining the 972 patients recently at Fitzsimons Hospital, on the basis of costs of other hospitals, would be an increase over the cost at Fitzsimons of:

At Letterman Hospital	$10,643.40
At El Paso Hospital	28,382.40
At Walter Reed	301,563.00
At veterans' hospitals	149,007.60

Abandonment of Fitzsimons Hospital would be accompanied by heavy transportation expenses which cannot be accurately estimated. On an assumption of an average cost of $50 per patient, this transportation charge would amount to $48,600.

In addition to this, there would be the cost of closing this large institution and moving its very valuable equipment and supplies. Doubtless additional construction would be necessary at other hospitals because of the increased demand that would be made by veterans entitled to hospitalization who will make this request because of deduction in their compensation.

It is estimated that in Colorado alone there are 1,200 active tuberculosis cases that will be entitled to hospitalization, and there are 200 tuberculosis cases in addition not entitled to pension or hospitalization, but who are disabled to a 75-percent degree and will request domiciliary care at a soldiers' home. These cases could be cared for economically and well at Fitzsimons in lieu of incurring construction costs and greater operating costs elsewhere.

SCHEDULE 2—CONSERVATION OF GOVERNMENT'S $4,000,000 INVESTMENT DEMANDS RETENTION OF FITZSIMONS HOSPITAL

Fitzsimons Hospital, built during the World War, in a suburb of Denver, Colo., is the largest Army hospital in the United States. It has a capacity of 1,832 beds. The site, costing approximately $150,000, was bought by citizens of Denver and leased to the United States Government for 999 years at $1 a year.

The large investment of the Government in this institution (estimated at $4,000,000), as well as the many thousand dollars spent in improvements since the opening of the hospital, including sums spent this last year, are jeopardized by the terms of its 999-year lease, which provides that title reverts to the lessor (Denver Chamber of Commerce, trustee) at the end of 1 year following the abandonment of the site for hospitalization purposes.

Clearly the sacrificing of a $4,000,000 investment by the Government cannot be termed true economy, nor in keeping with the dictates of prudent financial policy.

SCHEDULE 3.—PERFECTION OF TECHNIQUE AND SUCCESS IN TREATMENT OF TUBERCULOSIS DEMANDS RETENTION OF FITZSIMONS HOSPITAL

A unique tuberculosis treatment of extraordinary merit is available at Fitzsimons Hospital. It was developed there by the late Colonel Bruns with special facilities and a trained professional unit skilled in the practice of his methods. The annual report for 1932 of the Surgeon General of the United States Army fully and clearly sets forth the splendid results obtained at Fitzsimons in the treatment of tuberculosis.

In the section devoted to Fitzsimons General Hospital, Col. Carroll D. Buck, M.C., commanding, referring to the technique and results in the treatment of tuberculosis, says at page 276:

"A noteworthy feature in the treatment of pulmonary tuberculosis is the marked reduction in the rate of hemorrhages and other complications. In one group of 1,222 admissions there were only 45 pulmonary hemorrhages. In an entire tuberculosis service, with 1,332 admissions, only 108 cases of pulmonary hemorrhage were reported. The marked reduction in the frequency of this complication was due in a large measure to the uniformity in which artificial pneumothorax and other forms of collapse therapy were applied. In four of the largest tuberculosis units, 46.7 percent of the patients are receiving artificial pneumothorax treatment. The technique of the initial pneumothorax treatment has been standardized and carefully worked out so that there is a marked reduction in accidents which formerly frequently followed this procedure. There has not been a death from pulmonary embolism, and only 11 cases of spontaneous pneumothorax following the introduction of artificial pneumothorax. There has also been a marked reduction in the number of cases developing fluid under treatment. The improvement is due largely to the more judicious and more frequent refills with more careful fluoroscopic check before and after them. Approximately 65 percent of the patients are receiving some form of collapse therapy. The use of this form of treatment has also caused a marked reduction in the number of cases complicated by laryngitis or enterocolitis.

"About 400 cases in the various tuberculosis units were given heliotherapy treatment, the total treatments being approximately 9,900. Patients who were classed as 'activity undetermined' were often given heliotherapy as a test of activity. The other types of cases treated were abdominal tuberculosis lesions, fistulas, bone and joint cases, glandular and genito-urinary tuberculosis. In pulmonary tuberculosis it is limited to the fibrous cases after they have stood the test of graduated exercise. Seven platforms have now been installed in all of the tuberculosis as well as the medical and surgical wards. The alpine lamp treatments were given in some cases which were unable to take heliotherapy for various reasons."

And again at page 277:

"The surgery of pulmonary tuberculosis continues to be a most important feature of the surgical work and constitutes about 25 percent of the operations performed. It is to be repeated that surgery is not definitive treatment in pulmonary tuberculosis. The cases which come to operation have had long-continued treatment on the medical wards and the standard nonoperative treatment has failed to give satisfactory results. It is the expert in tuberculosis who must decide when surgery is to be resorted to and must advise as to the form which surgical intervention is to take. The success in carrying out most of these procedures depends on close cooperation between the medical and surgical services. The patient must be made to realize that an operation in this condition is not curative. It may be necessary to operate again, and no matter what is done surgically the disease still remains a medical condition, and medical treatment is as much indicated after as before surgical intervention. The surgeon has no miraculous power, and his work here, as in other departments of surgery, is beset with pitfalls, filled with disappointments, and only occasionally crowned with conspicuous success. This success, if any, must be evaluated by the medical service, for the patient returns to it long before any intelligent opinion of the outcome can be formed.

"The same type of surgical procedures were used during this year as in the past. They include phrenic exeresis, pneumoloysis, intrapiural pneumolysis (the Jacobaeus operation), extra plural thoracoplasty, and drainage and unroofing for empyema. In addition, two others have been tried, namely, excision of the scaleneus muscles in conjunction with phrenic exeresis and the unroofing and drainage of tuberculous cavities in the lungs."

SCHEDULE 4—RECOGNITION BY BOTH ARMY AND NAVY OF SUPERIORITY IN TREATMENT OF TUBERCULOSIS DEMANDS RETENTION OF FITZSIMONS HOSPITAL

That Fitzsimons is the hospital of the United States Army best suited for the treatment of tuberculosis cases, and recognized as such by the Surgeon General's Department and by the heads of the other Army hospitals is shown by Annual Report of the Surgeon General, United States Army, 1932, from which the following extracts are taken:

At page 262, the commanding officer of Walter Reed General Hospital at Washington, D.C., says:

"Tuberculosis section * * *. Military patients are sent to Fitzsimons General Hospital * * *."

At page 269 the officer in command of Letterman General Hospital at the Presidio, San Francisco, under heading "Tuberculosis section", says:

"This section, with a bed capacity of 38, is utilized for the diagnosis and temporary treatment only. The military patients are transferred to Fitzsimons General Hospital as soon as the diagnosis is made and their physical condition warrants it."

At page 313 the department surgeon in charge of Philippine Department says:

"Tuberculosis: The department surgeon reports that there was a slight increase in the rate for tuberculosis, both in the Philippines and China * * *. American soldier patients are returned to the United States."

(The undersigned has been informed from time to time that tuberculosis patients from the Philippines have been sent to Fitzsimons Hospital.)

At page 321, the report of the surgeon in command of Panama Canal Department says:

"Twenty-four cases of tuberculosis were transferred to Fitzsimons General Hospital, in comparison with 14 for the preceding year."

The superior advantages of Fitzsimons Hospital for the treatment of tuberculosis patients is also recognized by the Navy. In the Annual Report of the Surgeon General, United States Navy, 1932, page 23, under heading "Hospitalization", it is stated:

"This gives a total of 2,221,514 treatment days in naval hospitals for all classes of patients. This total does not include * * * 4,229 treatment days for tuberculosis patients at the naval unit, United States Army Fitzsimons General Hospital, Denver, Colo. * * *"

After referring to the total number of persons of the Navy under treatment, the report proceeds:

"This total does not include 10 tuberculosis patients at the naval unit, Fitzsimons General Hospital (U.S. Army), Denver, Colo. * * *"

In a personal interview on May 1, 1933, the Surgeon General of the Navy stated to the undersigned that he deplored the removal of Navy tuberculosis patients from Fitzsimons Hospital; that they were well cared for at Fitzsimons; that the Navy had no hospital suitable for the treatment of tuberculosis; that to send tuberculosis patients to Norfolk or Mare Island might be fatal to them.

SCHEDULE 5.—EMINENT MEDICAL SPECIALISTS ON TUBERCULOSIS URGE RETENTION OF FITZSIMONS HOSPITAL

A group of eminent medical specialists of national and, indeed, international reputation in the treatment of tuberculosis, while in attendance at the Congress of American Physicians and Surgeons in Washington, D.C., prepared and signed the attached statement urging that it be submitted in this connection as expert medical opinion on this subject.

The doctors point out the advantages both to the patients and to the Government of retaining Fitzsimons Hospital as a medical center for the treatment of tuberculosis.

They draw sharp attention to the very serious responsibility of jeopardizing the lives of patients should they be removed from Fitzsimons to other localities.

The letter from these eminent specialists is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D.C., May 9, 1933.

Hon. LAWRENCE LEWIS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. LEWIS: Fitzsimons General Hospital, located near Denver, is the largest and best of its kind in the United States for the treatment of tuberculosis. The equipment of the hospital is of the best and it has an unusually able technical personnel. The work of this hospital has been watched by everyone interested in tuberculosis work, especially those interested in heliotherapy and lung surgery.

The location of Fitzsimons is ideal, there being no better all-the-year-round climate in the United States than is to be found on the eastern plateau of the Rockies. The Southwest is a one-season climate, and so recognized by the private sanatoria directors, who advise their patients to go to the hills or mountains during the summer months. Such procedure would not be practical for the tuberculosis patients of the Army and Navy, and it would entail very great expense. We cannot believe that the Surgeon General of the Army would care to assume the responsibility of jeopardizing the lives of the large number of hospitalized patients by moving them to other locations at this time.

It is recognized that in time of war the military medical men find it necessary to issue drastic orders for the removal of patients from various hospitals. The necessities of the situation often override any consideration of the jeopardy of the lives of the patients. We are not now faced with such a situation. Humanitarian considerations should really come first in this instance.

We approve the administration's plan to balance the Budget, and heartily endorse President Roosevelt's policy to bring this about. Yet we do not think he wishes, or intends, to create hardship for the very ill. This plan of closing the hospital cannot be for economic reasons, unless we have been misinformed, for the per diem cost per patient has been much less at Fitzsimons than at any other Government hospital.

The undersigned Colorado physicians, attending the Congress of the American Physicians and Surgeons, now in session in Washington, urge the representatives from Colorado in Congress to make every effort to retain Fitzsimons Hospital for the treatment of Army and Navy patients. Your interest and cooperation will be greatly appreciated by the medical profession of Colorado.

Very truly yours,

C. F. Hegner, M.D., Denver; Leonard Freeman, M.D., Denver; G. Walter Holden, M.D., Denver; Henry Sewall, M.D., Denver; Charles E. Sevier, M.D., Denver; John A. Sevier, M.D., Colorado Springs; James J. Waring, M.D., Denver; Gerald B. Webb, M.D., Colorado Springs; Leonard Freeman, Jr., M.D., Denver.

SCHEDULE 6.—MILITARY PREPAREDNESS DEMANDS THE RETENTION OF FITZSIMONS HOSPITAL

Apparently it is the policy of the Veterans' Administration practically to abandon the use of Army hospitals for veteran patients, and to use instead Veterans' Administration hospitals. Not only from the point of view of economy (which is discussed in schedule 1), but also from the point of view of military preparedness, such policy, if carried out, would be disastrous. Clearly a sound governmental policy would dictate the maximum use of long-established Army hospitals. The curtailment or abandonment of Government hospitals to such extent as may be necessary should be limited to those directly under the Veterans' Administration.

The extensive governmental hospitalization of ex-service men is actually a temporary problem and the passing of the need for all of the 84 Veterans' Administration hospitals is but a matter of time. It is certain that within a comparatively brief period, measured by the life of the Nation, numbers of these Veterans' Administration hospitals will either be abandoned or put to other uses. But the Army will continue on; and, in case of war, the existence as "going concerns" of well-organized hospitals with efficient staffs will save many lives such as in our other wars have been sacrificed unnecessarily. It is clear that the closing of any particular Army hospital would detract just so much from military preparedness.

Especially is this true in the case of a hospital designed primarily for the treatment of a particular disease to which men of military age are peculiarly susceptible; a hospital located in a region selected from among all those in the Nation as being unusually well adapted by reason of its altitude and all-year-round climate to the successful treatment of that disease; a hospital where there has been organized as a result of years of selection a personnel trained in the use of special equipment to treat that disease; a hospital where there has been developed a technique in the treatment of that disease which has proved extraordinarily successful in arresting and curing that disease and returning its victims to useful civil vocations. Such a hospital is Fitzsimons for the treatment of tuberculosis.

In a national emergency Denver could supply immediately a civilian staff of skilled doctors, familiar with Fitzsimons technique and methods.

SCHEDULE 7.—CONSIDERATIONS OF HUMANITY DEMAND RETENTION OF FITZSIMONS HOSPITAL

The unparalleled advantage afforded by Colorado for the treatment of tuberculosis is so well recognized that it is unnecessary to elaborate on it. The chances of recovery are so much greater there than in any of the other Army, Navy, or veterans' hospitals, outside of Colorado, that the institution should be maintained for the joint use of all branches of the service.

The primary function of a hospital is to cure. If the Government wishes to do everything possible to cure its tuberculosis patients, then this institution should be saved for that purpose. The removal of present patients to other localities less desirable in the treatment of this disease would be to many of them a virtual death warrant. To other patients less seriously afflicted the change in climate and surroundings would cause marked retardation in their progress toward recovery. World-wide recognition has been given to the advancements made by Fitzsimons Hospital in the treatment of tuberculosis, and it would be a serious loss to have the staff and organization assembled there broken up and scattered as the result of closing the hospital.

There are many additional advantages of location enjoyed by Fitzsimons. Its proximity to seven Army posts, which vary from 1 hour to about 1½ days' travel to Fitzsimons; Denver, a city of 300,000 population, offers many advantages, such as rail connection for North and South, East and West; there is a low-cost basis of living in Denver which is an advantage to the families of veterans residing in the community, as well as to the institution itself, in the purchase of supplies; Denver offers a fine opportunity of employment to families of veterans, thus offering some relief to demands for charity which would otherwise be made; the proximity of Denver with its many cultural advantages, as well as the entertainment furnished, with the approval of the hospital authorities, by a large number of Denver organizations, helps build and maintain the morale of tuberculosis patients at Fitzsimons and is of valuable assistance during the period of recuperation.

LAWRENCE LEWIS,
Representative, First (Denver) District of Colorado.

OIL AND THE RECOVERY BILL

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD a statement on the oil industry.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to clarify the issue in regard to the proposed Government control of the oil industry of the United States. The President has suggested an amendment to the National Recovery Bill giving him authority to exercise such control. I have entire confidence in the President, and I am entirely in favor of his suggested amendment to the recovery bill. But I know that he cannot possibly himself exercise the power to control the oil industry. He will have to delegate it to some subordinate. Not knowing who may be appointed to exercise this power, I therefore am convinced that the basis of the proposed proration of oil should be fixed by the Congress.

Let me place the facts clearly before you.

The large oil companies are all for proration. They blithely propose two methods, which happen to be identical. They advocate proration on an acreage basis or on a cubical-content basis. Whichever one is selected, they win; for in either case such proration is not on the production of producing wells now in the field, but on that of oil-land holdings, developed or undeveloped.

What the independent oil producers want, and what this Congress should insist upon, is proration by potential production, based on development already made. In plain English, each well in each field will be allowed, under potential proration, to produce in proportion to its established ability to produce. Curtailment will be on a percentage basis. If the percentage should be fixed at, say, 06 percent, then a 1,000-barrel well will be permitted to produce 600 barrels a day, or the monthly equivalent. And this whether it belongs to a poor man or to a great corporation.

This is fair; it is easily adjusted; it puts the owner of a single well on precisely the same basis as the great corporation owning enormous oil fields. One producing well on a 5-acre tract thus is accorded precisely the same treatment as one producing well on a thousand acre tract. Because there is no injustice, no discrimination in favor of the huge corporations and against the small producers, the public is going to approve and applaud.

Proration by potential, as I have explained, protects the small producer and gives justice to all producers. That is emphatically not so with proration by the so-called "acreage basis" or by the identical cubical-content basis. Under either of the latter equally obnoxious methods, the Oil Trust seeking a monopoly of the Nation's oil business, will be given by the United States Government and by the permission of this Congress an unfair advantage over the small, independent oil producers, land owners, and royalty owners.

These great oil corporations, in control of large tracts of land, under the acreage plan of oil proration are able to make their unprofitable lands count on the same basis as their productive lands situated in a favored position on the oil structure. This simply means that lands which are relatively remote from proved oil structures and producing wells, and which are included in the same land holdings, can be consolidated in a so-called "unit plan" of operation and thus be allowed a prorated share of the oil production, although not actually contributing to that production. I say without fear of successful contradiction that this cry of "waste" and "overproduction" is just plain Oil Trust propaganda. There actually is no overproduction of crude oil in the United States, as the following figures from the United States Bureau of Mines conclusively proves:

	Barrels
The total demand for petroleum in the United States in 1932 was	936,770,000
The total domestic production of petroleum in the United States in 1932 was only	818,761,000
Excess demand over production	118,009,000
Average daily consumption of petroleum in the United States in 1932	2,554,000
Average daily production of petroleum in the United States in 1932	2,237,000
Excess consumption over production	317,000
Average daily consumption of petroleum in the United States in January 1933 (latest available figures)	2,424,000
Average daily production of petroleum in the United States in January 1933 (latest available figures)	2,161,000
Daily consumption in excess of production	263,000

Overproduction does not exist. It is not the problem of the industry. Monopoly is its problem and the problem of the people.

These great oil corporations have been crying overproduction for years and battling to force the acreage plan of proration on the independents of the oil industry. They say, in effect, "Let us regulate the oil industry on the acreage basis of proration and the little fellows will be forced into the unit plan of operation. In a short time, with the oil production under our control, the independent refiners will not be able to get any oil, and then our monopoly will be complete."

I need hardly tell you, gentlemen, that with such a monopoly in control of the oil industry, and with independent competition eliminated, gasoline prices will reach the sky, and the American consumers will pay and pay dearly.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House when it convenes on Monday next on the subject of "The Progress of Farm Relief Legislation", speaking for 20 minutes without interruption. I hope that no one will object.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, there has been a general understanding that the Speaker would not recognize anybody to make such a request in advance of the time when the address was to be made.

The SPEAKER. That is the understanding, and the Speaker will have to object himself and suggest that the request be made on Monday.

Mr. GRAY. Mr. Speaker, then I give notice that I shall make that request on Monday morning.

The SPEAKER. To obtain unanimous consent to address the House, it is necessary that the Member make the request upon the day he desires to speak.

INTERSTATE RAILROAD TRANSPORTATION

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (S. 1580) to relieve the existing national emergency in relation to interstate railroad transportation, and to amend sections 5, 15a, and 19a of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended. Pending that, I ask unanimous consent that when the House has completed its consideration of the bill the enrolling clerk have authority to change numbers of paragraphs and sections of the bill wherever necessary.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Texas.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill S. 1580, with Mr. HILL of Alabama in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

TITLE I—EMERGENCY POWERS

SECTION 1. As used in this title—

(a) The term "Commission" means the Interstate Commerce Commission.

(b) The term "coordinator" means the Federal coordinator of transportation hereinafter provided for.

(c) The term "committee" means any one of the regional coordinating committees hereinafter provided for.

(d) The term "carrier" means any common carrier by railroad subject to the provisions of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended, including any receiver or trustee thereof.

(e) The term "employee" includes every person in the service of a carrier (subject to its continuing authority to supervise and direct the manner of rendition of his service) who performs any work defined as that of an employee or subordinate official in accordance with the provisions of the Railway Labor Act.

(f) The term "State commission" means the commission, board, or official, by whatever name designated, exercising power to regulate the rates or service of common carrier by railroad under the laws of any State.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania: Page 30, line 18, after the word "thereof", add a new paragraph, as follows:

"(e) The term "subsidiary" means any company which is directly or indirectly controlled by or affiliated with any carrier or carriers. For the purpose of the foregoing definition, a company shall be deemed to be affiliated with a carrier if so affiliated within the meaning of paragraph (8) of section 5 of the Interstate Commerce Act, as amended by this act."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, before the gentleman discusses that, I rise to a point of order for the purpose of getting a decision from the Chair. I reserve the point of order to ask a parliamentary inquiry. The entire Senate bill comes from the House committee as one amendment. The committee has stricken out all of the Senate bill and put in its substitute as one amendment. Should that substitute be read in its entirety as one amendment, or is it to be read by sections?

The CHAIRMAN. The rule under which we are considering the Senate bill provides that the committee substitute shall be considered as an original bill under the 5-minute rule.

Mr. BLANTON. Then it will be read by sections?

The CHAIRMAN. It will be read by sections.

Mr. BLANTON. And we can offer amendments to each section after the reading of each section?

The CHAIRMAN. That is correct. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman from Texas comes too late.

Mr. BANKHEAD. There has been no debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas obtained recognition after the gentleman from Pennsylvania had offered his amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I reserved the point of order, which preserved the right in favor of the chairman of the committee and of every other Member of the House. Whenever a point of order is reserved, it is for the benefit of all Members, and the remarks I made were made under the reservation of the point of order. When I withdraw my reservation of the point of order, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] can renew it, when there has been no intervening debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair had disposed of the point of order made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], and the Chair then recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY].

Mr. BLANTON. But there had been no intervening debate. And when I withdrew my reservation, any other Member could renew it.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I rise to make a further point of order. I do not know what point of order the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] has in mind, but I submit there cannot be more than one point of order pending at the same time. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] raised a point of order, which the Chair decided, and immediately thereafter the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN], the chairman of the committee, made the point of order against the proposed amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania before the gentleman from Pennsylvania proceeded to debate.

It seems to me the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] was trying to raise the point of order within the proper time.

Mr. RAYBURN. I certainly made the point of order as soon as I could.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair feels that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had been recognized and had started to debate the amendment before the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] made his point of order.

Mr. RAYBURN. I beg leave to disagree with the Chair. The gentleman had not started to debate the amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. There must be debate ensue, and there had been no debate on the amendment. While the Chair had recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania, there had been no debate.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is advised that, according to the Official Reporter's notes, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] had not proceeded with any discussion and had not said anything. Therefore the Chair will entertain the point of order made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN].

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that this bill, title I, refers to railroads, and railroads only; and a subsidiary of a railroad may mean many, many things. It may be a hotel; it may be a shoe factory; it may be a health resort; it may be a bus line, or a truck line, or an amusement park, or what not. This bill is written around the proposition that it applies only to railroads and not to subsidiaries; and the committee, by motion, struck that section out of the bill as it was passed by the Senate.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Of course, the Chair knows that this amendment, as I have offered it, is identical with the provision carried in the Senate bill, which was sent to the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. It is a definition only, a definition which seems to me to be essential to this bill for the protection of railroad investment and railroad labor. I cannot see how a point of order against the definition of the word "subsidiary" could be upheld. I submit the matter to the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. HILL of Alabama). The Chair is ready to rule. The pending section deals with definitions. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLY] is merely a definition. If there is no provision in the bill with reference to subsidiaries, of course the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania would be meaningless. The section merely deals with definitions. This is the proper place for definitions. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, may we again have the amendment reported?

There being no objection, the Clerk again reported the amendment offered by Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this amendment is to clarify certain provisions of the bill and make them effective. The word "subsidiary", which was used in the measure as sent to the House committee, was defined under the Senate bill. It should be defined in this bill. I agree with the Chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, that this amendment will refer to bus and motor companies, to express companies, and to other transportation companies of that kind which should be covered in this bill if the purposes of the measure are to be carried out.

For instance, Congress about 2 years ago passed a bill reported by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads in this House, providing that where train service was discontinued the railroad company should be given the contract for carrying the mail by motor bus without any competition, without any taking of bids, and at the rate which was paid for the mail transportation on the trains. That was a distinct advantage. Now if we omit these bus companies in this bill, it will be possible for the railroad companies to deal with employees of those bus and motor companies in a way which will be a hardship to them and in part nullify the protective provisions of this bill. We are endeavoring to protect workers in the railroad service. It seems to me to be but just that we protect those who will be assigned to the motor and bus companies when they are transferred from the regular railroad service.

There are also express companies to be considered. These companies are subsidiaries of the railroad companies. They have a force of men in the terminals and elsewhere handling express matter and another force of men handling baggage and other material from the trains. It will be possible to transfer men from the railroad service into the express service and then use any method that may be desired to economize at the expense of the workers employed in the express company. That is unfair. If we are to do anything effective toward giving protection to the workers in the transportation industry, we certainly should make sure there is no loophole left where hardships can be inflicted upon those in the express, motor bus, and other subsidiary companies.

Mr. MEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Yes; I yield.

Mr. MEAD. Some Members are unduly alarmed because they feel this might apply to hotels, coal mines, and so forth. While I do not believe it is necessary so far as the change I suggest is concerned, would the gentleman agree to a change in his amendment, adding the word "transportation" before the word "subsidiary", so that it would read "transportation subsidiary"?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. Of course, that is the purpost of my amendment. If it needs clarification, I would accept the gentleman's suggestion. It is the purpose to deal solely with transportation agencies. The Pullman Co. is another in addition to those I have named. That is a separate organization, with many employees engaged in transportation, and yet it does not come directly under the provisions of this bill, unless "subsidiaries" are covered. From every standpoint it seems to me we should make sure that these definitions are comprehensive enough to cover the word "subsidiary" and make it apply to those companies, in order to make this bill serve the purpose of regulating and developing transportation on a fair and square basis.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. It has come to my mind that at the present time we have no legislation in any way governing transportation as to motor busses and trucks in any way connected with interstate commerce.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. That is true, but we can reach them through this bill by including these subsidiary companies.

Mr. SNELL. How are you going to reach them when there is no law on the statute books controlling them? I was in favor of a bill we had several years ago to control them, and I think they should be controlled; but it seems to me the gentleman is attempting to go at it in the wrong way to try to reach them through this bill, when there is no legislation on the statute books in any way controlling their operation.

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I may say to the gentleman from New York that under this bill we can establish the control he favors. When we are putting restrictions on the dismissal of transportation workers on the railroads, we can make them effective by defining as subsidiaries these bus and motor lines, express companies, and others.

Mr. SNELL. Does not the gentleman think he is putting restrictions on a corporation that has none of the advantages of Federal legislation and regulation?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. I have just given one instance where we have given railroad companies valuable motor-bus contracts, without any competition whatever, because they were carrying mail under a railway mail contract. That is a very great advantage, which they very greatly desired.

Mr. SNELL. To a bus company?

Mr. KELLY of Pennsylvania. To a bus company, a railroad subsidiary, without competition. I am asking that they be included under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. HUDDLESTON. Mr. Chairman, the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania in its present form is dangerous. Not even a member of the committee, who have given this subject careful study, can be certain of the field for its operation, not to speak of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, who has not had the opportunity to give it the study that we have.

The committee considered this subject very carefully, and unanimously, as I recall, agreed that it would be dangerous to adopt such a provision. If it were confined to "subsidiaries" under the jurisdiction of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the situation would be different; but under the terms of the amendment as offered it includes "any company", whether transportation company or otherwise, whether it be mercantile, hotel, amusement, or whatever it might be which is "directly or indirectly affiliated" with a railroad company. So that if certain of the stockholders of a railroad company should see fit to incorporate an amusement park or a hotel with the view to operating it near a railroad terminal for the mutual advantage of both, although the enterprise was not owned by the railroad company, and although it was not controlled by it, under the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania the coordinator would have jurisdiction to step into that purely intrastate proposition and to shut it down.

The gentleman expressed interest in employees—there is no provision in this bill for taking into consideration the interest of the employees of these subsidiaries. There is no provision by which they could be represented or their interests cared for. Note the remoteness of the connection with a railroad carrier. The employees of a purely intrastate company and operation might have their interests jeopardized, perhaps sacrificed, by some action the coordinator might take.

Mr. Chairman, the subject of railroads and interstate commerce is highly complex. May I say that after 12 years' service on this committee I recognize more than ever my limitations and the number of things I do not know about it. How presumptuous, then, it would be for me, without having given any special study to it or having heard any witnesses or knowing anything in particular about the subject, to undertake to thrust into this bill an amendment of such far-reaching importance. I cannot think of anything which would be calculated to cause more far-reaching consequences or perhaps do an incalculable injury than an amendment of a technical nature such as this.

If the gentleman wants to amend this bill, he should amend it in some respect in which there is not such complexity and in which we might be able to understand what the consequences of the amendment may be, and not undertake to thrust a charge into it and blow it up as an experiment to see what consequences might flow from it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. RAYBURN) there were—ayes 30, noes 79.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. In order to foster and protect interstate commerce in relation to railroad transportation by preventing and relieving obstructions and burdens thereon resulting from the present acute economic emergency, and in order to safeguard and maintain an adequate national system of transportation, there is hereby created the office of Federal coordinating of transportation, who shall be appointed by the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, or be designated by the President from the membership of the Commission. If so designated, the coordinator shall be relieved from other duties as Commissioner during his term of service to such extent as the President may direct; except that the coordinator shall not sit as a member of the Commission in any proceedings for the review or suspension of any order issued by him as coordinator. The coordinator shall have such powers and duties as are hereinafter set forth and prescribed; and may, with the approval of the President, and without regard to the Civil Service laws and the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, appoint and fix the compensation of such assistants and agents, in addition to the assistance provided by the Commission, as may be necessary to the performance of his duties under this act. The office of the coordinator shall be in Washington, D.C., and the Commission shall provide such office space, facilities, and assistance as he may request and it is able to furnish. The coordinator shall receive such compensation as the President shall fix, except that if designated from the Commission, he shall receive no compensation in addition to that which he receives as a member of the Commission.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. MAPES: Page 31, line 22, after the words "the President", strike out the remainder of the line, all of line 23 and line 24, to and including the word "agents", and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Appoint such experts and assistants to act in a confidential capacity, and, subject to the provisions of the Civil Service laws, such other officers and employees, and in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923 fix the salary of such experts, assistants, officers, and employees."

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I do not care to take any more of the time of the Committee than is necessary to explain what this amendment does. I offered the same motion in the committee in substance.

The amendment strikes out the language in the bill which authorizes the coordinator to appoint his employees and assistants without regard to the Civil Service law and to fix their salaries without regard to the Classification Act of 1923, and substitutes therefor language similar to that contained in the Railroad Labor Act which will put the office of the coordinator under the classified Civil Service. The amendment would permit the coordinator to appoint necessary experts without regard to the Civil Service laws and regulations, but the rest of his office force would be appointed in accordance with Civil Service laws and regulations and their salaries would be fixed according to the Classification Act of 1923.

I know that during this session a good deal of legislation has been passed authorizing the appointment of employees without regard to the Civil Service laws and authorizing the appointing officers to fix their compensation without regard to the Classification Act, in fact, without any limitation at all upon the discretion of the appointing officer in that respect.

I think Congress and the country eventually will come to realize that such provisions are vicious.

I do not want any legislation with such a provision in it to pass without very definitely expressing my opposition to it.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. After the extreme interest shown by the majority yesterday in the honest and efficient carrying-out of the Classification Act and the Civil Service laws, does the gentleman think they will have any objection to adopting his amendment at this time?

Mr. MAPES. I should like to have them agree to it. At any rate I shall give them the opportunity to vote upon it.

Mr. SNELL. I am sure after the exhibition we had here yesterday they will grant the gentleman's request.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, this provision of the bill was very thoroughly considered, not only at the hearings but in the committee. The committee turned down the amendment of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] by an overwhelming majority.

I may say that no one knows at this time who is going to be the coordinator, unless it is the President of the United States. It has been stated in various press reports that Commissioner Eastman will be furloughed from the Interstate Commerce Commission and made the coordinator. I doubt if his appointment would be displeasing to anybody, because he is a man of outstanding ability and has the confidence of the shippers and the public in general, as well as of labor and the railroads, as few other men in his position over the years have had.

One of the things that Mr. Eastman was very definite about was that among those whom the coordinator would call around him would be men who should be of the highest technical skill that he could get, and he thought it would greatly cripple the efforts and the accomplishments of the coordinator if he had to go to the Civil Service rolls to get these employees.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. In the building-up of this organization will it not also be necessary to have quite a number of what we may call average clerks and assistants in connection with the work?

Mr. RAYBURN. That is true.

Mr. SNELL. Would it not be all right to put them under Civil Service?

Mr. RAYBURN. This act will run for 1 year, under the law, and by proclamation of the President may be extended for another year. It will be in operation only 2 years. It is thought that in building up this organization to do this expert work, the coordinator should be given the privilege of selecting the help that he thinks is necessary, and it probably would not run more than 100 people.

Mr. SNELL. I understand that; but considering the facts that exist here at the present time, when a great many of these Civil Service employees are going to be out of jobs on account of the new orders combining and coordinating various activities of the Government, you have these people here now, and they are accustomed to this kind of work, and would it not be better to take care of them rather than bring in a lot of new people here who would not be acquainted with the work?

Mr. RAYBURN. I should think if the coordinator were a capable man, and I presume he will be, he will be the type of man who will call around him capable people; and if there are more capable people among those who are discharged from positions under the Civil Service in Washington, he will take them.

Mr. SNELL. But a large number of these jobs would simply need efficient clerks; and if they have been doing that kind of work for some time, we may presume they are efficient. We have these people here and to a certain extent we owe them some obligation, and it seems to me it would be only fair to this number of employees if you were to allow at least the common employees to come under the Civil Service laws, and especially since on yesterday you showed such interest in the honest application of the law.

Mr. RAYBURN. I happened not to be here at that time yesterday, but I want to say to the gentleman that when he talks about honest application of the law——

Mr. SNELL. I accept the gentleman's apology.

Mr. RAYBURN. There has not been any such thing.

Mr. SNELL. I am not arguing that, but you say that you want honest administration of the law.

Mr. RAYBURN. There has not been any such thing, for the simple reason that the gentleman knows, as well as I do, that with respect to States even as far away as his own State, and especially the States in the far South, the States of Virginia and Maryland and the District of Columbia have as many on the Civil Service rolls as any other half a dozen States of the Union.

Mr. SNELL. That can be taken care of with the law as it exists at the present time. We are all agreed on that, but the other question remains with respect to the honest and efficient administration of the law, and I think we ought to observe the law here in the House if we are going to ask the Commission to observe it.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think, Mr. Chairman, it would be very much better for the orderly work of the coordinator if he were allowed to choose his own corps of workers.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes.

Mr. MAY. Does not the chairman of the committee feel that necessarily in the organization of any new administration under this bill that the man who has charge of its administration can take care of all these things better than anybody else?

Mr. RAYBURN. Oh, I think so; yes.

Mr. MEAD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAYBURN. I yield.

Mr. MEAD. In view of the attitude of the Republican Party when President Hoover's program was up for consideration and they took all those jobs out of the Civil Service, does not the gentleman think they ought to be consistent now?

Mr. RAYBURN. As I have just said, I agree with the gentleman from New York.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer a substitute amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Substitute amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON for the amendment offered by Mr. MAPES: Page 31, line 24, after the word "appoint", in line 23, strike out the words "and fix the compensation of."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, under this language, unless we strike out, all these assistants and employees will have their salaries fixed by the coordinator.

None of us know who is to be appointed as coordinator. We do know that it is reported that the president of the Southern Railway has been receiving $125,000 per year, and that in order to bring itself in line to receive loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, it has reduced the salary of its president to $60,000. This coordinator may be the kind of big-hearted personage who thinks it is all right to pay these 50-, 60-, 75-, 100-, and 200-thousand dollar salaries. And after we give him carte blanc authority, it will then be too late to complain when he begins to pay the salaries.

After all, it comes out of the pockets of the people. The railroads have learned that the Interstate Commerce Commission is going to give them a fair return on their money invested, and to make up for the expenses of running railroads including these outrageous salaries paid officials, the Interstate Commerce Commission raises the freight and passenger tariffs accordingly. So the people pay for it. And the railroads have quit fighting against bills, but let any kind of a bill be passed, and then they get relief from the Interstate Commerce Commission.

We do not know whether this coordinator will pay to his assistants and employees five thousand, ten thousand, fifteen thousand, or twenty-five thousand. I am getting tired of voting for bills with that language in it, allowing certain departments to fix the compensation themselves, and having the assurance given as an excuse for it, that the salaries will not be exorbitant, and then as soon as the set-up is made, when you get the list of salaries you find out that they are exorbitant. Then we cannot stop it. The time to stop this big salary business is in the making of the law. The time to prevent the coordinator from paying exorbitant salaries is right now in this bill, by putting in it a proper limitation.

Mr. RAYBURN. The gentleman understands that this money does not come out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. BLANTON. I know that eventually it comes out of the pockets of the people, for the Interstate Commerce Commission always raises the freight and passenger tariffs to take care of all expenses. If we do not stop exorbitant salaries being paid when people are starving to death, we ought to say that Congress does not believe in orderly government, run in behalf of the people.

Mr. McFARLANE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No, I regret that I cannot yield; I have only 5 minutes. We had a bill here the other day in which the House provided for an additional $50,000,000 being loaned to the insurance companies, and at first that bill provided that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation would not loan any money until these companies reduced the salaries of their officials down to not over $17,500 per annum. The committee eliminated that wise provision from the bill. When we tried to put it back, in the debate we showed that the insurance companies had raised the salaries of their presidents and other officials until—for instance, the New York Life was paying its president $125,000 a year. The Metropolitan Life was paying its president $200,000 a year, and yet there are some people starving to death in various parts of the United States.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Let me say to the gentleman that they have not borrowed any money and have not asked for any.

Mr. BLANTON. They could do it under the act we passed, and yet that wise limitation was stricken from the bill, and the matter of forcing them to reduce salaries was left to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. All it has done is to require them to reduce these huge salaries 60 percent so that, instead of paying its President $200,000, the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co. could pay its President only $80,000 per annum—$5,000 more than the President of the United States gets.

Are you in favor of that? The time to stop these outrageous salaries is right now.

I tried to stop them when the Reconstruction Finance Corporation Act was passed. Excuses then were given. We were assured that it would not pay big salaries, and yet as soon as it was set up and we got the break-down of its salaries, we found that they were paying one man $16,500 a year and numerous others almost that amount. It is outrageous the way the salaries are paid under such blanket provisions as are put in this bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. HASTINGS. Under the gentleman's amendment, if adopted, what salaries would be received?

Mr. BLANTON. They could not pay more than $10,000, which is provided under the Classification Act. I am not in favor of that act and it ought to be repealed, as its maximums are entirely too high; but, thank God, it does limit them to $10,000. If you strike out this language provided in my amendment, they cannot pay a salary of over $10,000. Is not that far more than enough for the assistants and employees of this coordinator?

I do not think we ought to pay that, but we should put at least that limit on it, and from now on every bill that is brought into this House is going to have a sane limitation on salaries if I can get my wish about it.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas. First, let me read from the hearings on page 46:

Commissioner EASTMAN. I do not think that any man ought to accept this job unless he is given absolutely a free hand in the matter of appointments.

As to the amendment of my colleague from Texas, if his amendment is adopted, he leaves in the language "without regard to the Civil Service laws and the Classification Act" that he is talking about. He says that under that they cannot be paid more than $10,000, but he leaves the bill so that that is not regarded. Under the bill as it passed the Senate not more than $250,000 a year can be expended by the coordinator, for the simple reason that under the Senate bill the railroads are assessed $1 per mile, while under the House bill it is thought there may be a necessity for a little more money than that, and we put in a limit of not more than $2 a mile on each individual railroad, which would amount to about $500,000.

Mr. BLANTON. But my colleague knows that if we strike the language out and put in no restrictions as to compensation, before they can pay a single salary they will have to bring the set-up and get it approved by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. RAYBURN. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. BLANTON. How would they get them paid?

Mr. RAYBURN. They would naturally pay them out of the assessment made against the railroads, this amount of money that is provided in the bill.

Mr. HASTINGS. May I ask the chairman of the committee a specific question? If the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is not adopted and the language remains in the bill as it is written, what is the maximum amount—or is there a maximum or minimum amount—that any of these officers may receive?

Mr. RAYBURN. The maximum amount is $500,000 which the coordinator can spend.

Mr. HASTINGS. That is the aggregate amount that may be paid all the employees; but I want to know if there is anything in the bill that would limit the amount paid to an individual?

Mr. RAYBURN. Not a thing.

Mr. HASTINGS. Then they could get $25,000 or $100,000?

Mr. RAYBURN. Yes; to come out of the revenues of the railroads and not out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. HASTINGS. They could go to any amount except that they could not exceed in the aggregate $500,000.

Mr. RAYBURN. I do not know whether there is anything to the rumor, but it is generally understood that Mr. Eastman will be the coordinator. He receives $12,000 a year, less 15 percent. I doubt whether he would employ anybody at a higher rate than he gets himself.

Mr. HASTINGS. Why not put a limitation in to that extent?

Mr. RAYBURN. I think it would be a mistake and would do no good.

Mr. FORD. Mr. Eastman gets $8,500 a year. He was cut from $12,000 to $10,000, and then he received a cut of 15 percent.

Mr. RAYBURN. That is correct.

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, and in my time I ask unanimous consent that the Clerk again report the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the Blanton amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman from Michigan yield to permit me to ask leave to substitute an amendment for the one that I have offered?

Mr. MAPES. I refuse to yield at the present time. I have no complaint to make with the speech which the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] made, but I submit to the Committee that his amendment means nothing.

The amendment which I submitted is definite. It does what the gentleman has in mind, and in addition brings the employees under the Civil Service. The coordinator would still be allowed to select experts without reference to the Civil Service law, but all other employees would be selected according to the rules of the Civil Service law, and the compensation in all cases would be fixed according to the Classification Act of 1923. Congress spent a good deal of time considering the matter before the passage of the Classification Act. It applies to all Government employees. By the adoption of my amendment the coordinator would be relieved of having to pass upon the question of what was to be paid to each man employed by him.

The gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] has called attention to the fund that is to be used by the coordinator. The House committee changed the recommendation of the Senate and provided that the railroads should pay into the fund to meet the expenses of the coordinator $2 per mile for every mile of railroad in the United States. That will provide the coordinator with $500,000 to use in 1 year. If no limitation is placed upon him in the exercise of his discretion, the sky will be the limit. I agree entirely with the argument of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] as far as it goes, but I am opposed to his amendment. It ought to be voted down and the amendment which I have submitted ought to be adopted by the House.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the amendment which I offered for the present.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON]?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, which is at the Clerk's desk, as a substitute for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. BLANTON as a substitute for the amendment offered by Mr. MAPES: Page 31, line 23, strike out the words "and the Classification Act of 1923 as amended"; and in line 24 strike out the words "and fix the compensation of."

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, this modified amendment meets the objection raised by the Chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, my friend from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN]. If we will pass this amendment, as I have changed it, they cannot pay any salary in excess of $10,000 to anybody, and the salaries they do pay must comport with the provisions of the Classification Act of 1923 as amended. It does not leave to the coordinator, one man in the United States, the privilege of fixing the compensation of every assistant and every employee he has, at any exorbitant amount he may allow.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. SNELL. If you are going to be fair on one line, why not take the whole proposition and use them the same as you do in every other department of the Government?

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman means also put back the language about making them come through the Civil Service?

Mr. SNELL. Yes. I should like the gentleman to tell us why not?

Mr. BLANTON. I am going to get 15 minutes here some time today and tell the great minority leader, and he is one of the greatest "minority" I ever saw——

Mr. SNELL. It will not be necessary to put that in the RECORD. You have put it in several times, and everybody knows it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. I am going to tell him what a farce the Civil Service has been for the last 12 years under his administration.

Mr. SNELL. That is all right. We will grant that. Why do you not repeal the law, then?

Mr. BLANTON. I cannot yield further to the former great Chairman of the Rules Committee, who knows the rules and who ought to obey them by not interrupting until I yield.

Mr. SNELL. I thank the gentleman. He does know something about the rules, too.

Mr. BLANTON. Knowing the rules, he ought not interrupt me. [Laughter.] I want to tell you something about the administration of the Civil Service under the Snell regime—the great minority leader. Here is the city of Washington, with less than 500,000 population. It is entitled by law to 132 Civil Service employees. Yet it has 10,778 of its people on the pay roll as Civil Service employees. This city of Washington has 25 times as many of its citizens on the pay roll as has the great State of Texas, 900 miles across it east and west, and 900 miles across it north and south. As was stated by my colleague from Texas, the chairman of this committee, the city of Washington, the State of Maryland, and the State of Virginia have more employees on the Government pay rolls than any other 15 States in this Nation.

Mr. HASTINGS. Or in 45 States.

Mr. BLANTON. It is outrageous. Here we put a stop on that abuse the other day in an amendment on a bill and it has gone to the Senate, and they have torn our amendment all to pieces and fixed it so that they can continue to do this, to carry out this so-called farcical "Civil Service law" under the Snell regime. [Laughter.] We are getting tired of it.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. SNELL. As a matter of fact, the gentleman knows very well that I have never had anything to do with the Civil Service law.

Mr. BLANTON. Well, he is the only spokesman here for it now.

Mr. SNELL. Is that not true?

Mr. BLANTON. Well, he is the only spokesman for it now on the floor. You cannot get anybody else to approve it.

Mr. SNELL. I am not speaking for it. [Laughter.] I am for all the laws on the statute books, and you have not the courage to repeal the Civil Service law.

Mr. BLANTON. I have got the courage now to vote to repeal it and to stop this infernal injustice to all the other States of the Union.

Mr. SNELL. You are going to do a real injustice to everybody in the Civil Service, and you do not have the courage, with all your votes, to repeal a law, which in effect you are doing by piecemeal.

Mr. BLANTON. I will put my courage up against the courage of the gentleman from New York any time.

Mr. SNELL. Start in on it now.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask the former Chairman of the Committee on Rules to observe the rules and not interrupt me.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas declines to yield further.

Mr. COOPER of Ohio. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I am sorry; I cannot. I want to attend to the gentleman from Potsdam first. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas declines to yield.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. Under the Snell regime——

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Texas is not proceeding in order.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I am in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas will proceed in order and discuss his amendment.

Mr. BLANTON. And I know the rules better than the former Chairman of the Rules Committee, and I observe them better. [Laughter.] You know under his regime——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. I will deal with that later, Mr. Chairman, as there are many interesting rules and regulations under the Civil Service during the last 12 years that deserve discussing. Under the unanimous consent granted me, I would like to say here and now that shortly after President Harding was inaugurated every Democratic postmaster in the country, practically, was forced to resign, and they were replaced with Republicans. When a Civil Service examination was held, and none of the three eligibles were satisfactory to the Republican organization, that examination was discarded and a new one held, until there was a Republican eligible on the list that would satisfy the Republicans.

Our beloved colleague, Hon. ED POU, the dean of Congressmen here, represents a Democratic district in North Carolina. It is a cotton district. He has been a Member of this House for 31 years. He is the honored Chairman of the great Committee on Rules. Yet every cotton statistician in his Democratic cotton district is a Republican and has been for 10 years. That illustrates what the United States Civil Service is under Republican rule. I want to see Democrats, loyal and worthy, in charge of every appointive position in this Government. And, in my judgment, the time has come for this change, most important to the people, to take place.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, in this bill we are giving more power to one man over property in the United States than was ever given to any one man before in the history of the country. We are giving this coordinator control over $20,000,000,000 worth of property that is owned by the people. The railroads are to pay the expenses of this coordinator, and if this coordinator is big enough to hold down the job we are going to give him, he is big enough to appoint his employees and fix their salaries. If he is not big enough, then the President of the United States falls very short of what I think his ability is.

Mr. BOILEAU. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, the other day I tried to get 5 minutes' time to discuss a matter that is again brought on the floor this afternoon.

Day before yesterday, and today, gentlemen have stated from the floor of the House that under the law there were only 138 residents of the District of Columbia entitled to be employed in the Civil Service, and that because of the fact there are more than that number of residents of the District of Columbia employed in the Civil Service they have found fault with the system.

Personally, I believe it would be unfair unless we did employ many times more than 138 residents of the District of Columbia in the Civil Service.

Let me call attention to the fact that if a man came from your State or mine 30 or 40 years ago and worked for the Government here in the District of Columbia he retained his residence in your State or my State. He came here as a young man, we will assume, was married and raised a family. Those boys and girls are now grown up and have become young men and women. They are not citizens of Wisconsin, Texas, or Oklahoma. They are citizens and residents of the District of Columbia. There is no other place for them to find employment here in the District of Columbia except in the Federal service. This is not an industrial city. This is the seat of the National Government and it is well known that practically all people living here, or at least a large percentage of them, must find employment in the Federal service.

If we are to say that only 138 people who are residents of the District of Columbia are to receive employment in the Civil Service, then we must assume that these young people must leave their family ties, these young men and women who were born and raised here in the District of Columbia must run out to Oklahoma, Texas, or Wisconsin to find employment.

I do not claim to be the champion of the cause of the people of the District of Columbia. This is the first time I have found it necessary, in my judgment, to defend the people of the District of Columbia on the floor of the House, but I think it would be grossly unfair to have any system whereby the number of the residents of the District of Columbia on the Federal pay roll is restricted to 138.

I think it is only fair and just that there should be a larger number of them employed by the Government. If we do not give them jobs here, it means they must go out of the District of Columbia, leave their families, leave all behind them, go out to Michigan, Wisconsin, Oklahoma, Texas, and other States and compete with citizens there for jobs. People born and raised in the District are acclimated to conditions here. Their entire lives have been spent here, and I, for one, protest against any bill which would limit the number of Federal employees from the District of Columbia to 138.

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOILEAU. I yield.

Mr. SNELL. Is it not a fact that the proportion for the District of Columbia in the Civil Service has been going on for the last 40, 50, or 75 years?

Mr. BOILEAU. I believe the gentleman is absolutely correct. I do not believe people from other States should come here and take jobs from people who are doing their work well; residents of the District of Columbia should not lose their jobs just because they happen to live in the Nation's Capital. [Applause.]

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, we want to get along with this bill. I want to give everybody an opportunity to discuss the bill, but hereafter I shall make a point of order against anyone who speaks out of order.

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last three words.

Mr. Chairman, I want to speak on two points. First, with reference to the amendment of the gentleman from Texas,

I want to call the attention of the members of the committee to the fact that if the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] is adoped it will not affect the salary of the coordinator, because by reference to the bill at page 32, lines 6 to 10, inclusive, the following language is found:

The coordinator shall receive such compensation as the President shall fix, except that if designated from the Commission he shall receive no compensation in addition to that which he receives as a member of the Commission.

This part of the section, of course, is not affected by the amendment of the gentleman from Texas, and if the amendment of the gentleman from Texas is adopted, it will not affect, therefore, the right of the President to fix the salary of the coordinator. I think the other salaries should be limited. Therefore I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PARKER of New York. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. PARKER of New York. If the gentleman will read the further provisions of the bill he will find that the President can fix all salaries.

Mr. HASTINGS. I am not in favor of that. I think there ought to be some limitation upon the salaries of the subordinates appointed by the coordinator.

From the chairman of the committee and others I have tried to ascertain whether any limitation has been placed upon the salaries of any of these other employees, but they have not been able to show me where it is contained in this bill.

If the amendment of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] means a limitation on these salaries except that of the coordinator, I am in favor of it, because I do not believe exorbitant salaries ought to be paid. If we are going to provide salaries, I think we ought to put some limitation on them.

Now, if larger salaries are necessary for experts or other employees, I think we ought to be frank enough to so provide in this bill that we may not lay ourselves open to criticism hereafter.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. That is the reason this language is put in this bill, to permit them to be without the operation of the Classification Act and to be able to pay the employees any amount the coordinator may want to pay. So when you strike this language out it means knocking out the limitations of the Classification Act under which the maximum salary is $10,000.

Mr. HASTINGS. I hope the gentleman's construction is correct. I favor the amendment with that construction. If we vote this amendment and exorbitant salaries are fixed, we are responsible.

Now, with reference to the Civil Service law and in answer to the gentleman from Wisconsin: Here you have an act that was passed January 16, 1883. Let me read the provision of this act, for it has been misquoted all too frequently by every partisan paper in the District of Columbia.

This act says:

Third. Appointments to the public service aforesaid in the departments at Washington shall be apportioned among the several States and Territories and the District of Columbia upon the basis of population as ascertained at the last preceding census.

That act was passed on January 16, 1883. In other words, it was passed 50 years ago.

Now, what I am contending for is that in the administration of this law it ought to be observed.

Mr. BOILEAU. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Not now. I have only 1 minute left. I think the gentleman's State of Wisconsin is entitled to fair representation among the employees in the District of Columbia. I think the gentleman's State of New York is entitled to fair representation as well as the State of the gentleman from Michigan. I think every State of this Union is entitled to its fair apportionment of Federal employees in accordance with the terms of the act of January 16, 1883, and I will bet you that no man here on this floor will dare go back to his district and tell them that they do not have competent men and women there to fill their quota. When and if you do, send me a clipping from your home paper for my scrapbook.

The pro forma amendments were withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute amendment offered by the gentleman from Texas for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 33, noes 97.

So the substitute amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now recurs on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Michigan.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BLANTON) there were—ayes 42, noes 90.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. LANHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question.

I understand that this bill, as it passed the Senate, contained a provision which prohibited the cancelation of through routes over railroad lines except with the prior consent or approval of the coordinator. It is contended by some that many of the shorter lines would likely have to be abandoned unless they could participate in through traffic. I should like to ask for information what the provisions of the pending bill are with regard to this matter.

Mr. RAYBURN. If a railroad is acting under the coordinator, it cannot be done without the consent of the coordinator.

Mr. LANHAM. And if not acting under the coordinator, then it would be done according to existing regulations?

Mr. RAYBURN. In accordance with existing laws and regulations.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. The coordinator shall divide the lines of the carriers into three groups, to wit, an eastern group, a southern group, and a western group, and may from time to time make such changes or subdivisions in such groups as he may deem to be necessary or desirable. At the earliest practicable date after the coordinator shall have initially designated such groups, three regional coordinating committees shall be created, one for each group, and each committee shall consist of five regular members and two special members. The carriers in each group, acting each through its board of directors or its receiver or receivers or trustee or trustees or through an officer or officers designated for the purpose by such board, shall select the regular members of the committee representing that group, and shall prescribe the rules under which such committee shall operate; but no railroad system shall have more than one representative on any such committee. In such selection each carrier shall have a vote in proportion to its mileage lying within the group. The two special members of each committee shall be selected in such manner as the coordinator may approve, one to represent the steam railroads within the group which had in 1932 railway operating revenues of less than $1,000,000 and the other to represent electric railways within the group not owned by a steam railroad or operated as a part of a general steam railroad system of transportation. Each such special member shall have reasonable notice of all meetings of his committee at which any matter affecting any carrier which he represents is to be considered, and may participate in the consideration and disposition of such matter. Members of the committees may be removed from office and vacancies may be filled in like manner.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. RAMSPECK: On page 32, in line 19, after the word "and", strike out "two special members" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "Four special members, two of whom shall represent the shippers and shall be selected by such method as the coordinator may prescribe."

Mr. RAMSPECK. Mr. Chairman, I am offering this amendment at the suggestion of the Atlanta Freight Bureau. This organization represents the shippers in my district, and they feel that the shippers ought to have representation on this coordinating committee, just as they had during the war when we had the railroads under the direction of a Director General of Railroads. The shippers had representation at that time, and they say it was very helpful to them.

I think if we are going to have control of our transportation system by this coordinator and by this regional committee, which is set up under section 3, we certainly ought to give the people who furnish the freight and pay the freight some representation in the decisions to be made, and I hope this committee will adopt the amendment.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I yield.

Mr. BULWINKLE. Has the gentleman read section 9, which provides:

Any interested party, including, among others, any carrier, shipper, or employee, or any group of carriers, shippers, or employees, or any State commission—

And so on—dissatisfied with any order of the coordinator may, at any time prior to the effective date of the order, file a petition with the Commission asking that such order be reviewed and suspended pending such review.

Does not that give sufficient representation?

Mr. RAMSPECK. I may say to the gentleman I do not think that serves the same purpose or gives them the necessary representation. These coordinating committees are going to make some very important decisions that are going to affect the shippers and their interests, and I cannot see any reason why these committees should not have shipper representation.

Mr. BULWINKLE. This is strictly a railroad proposition, and anything affecting the public interest goes before the coordinator and before the Interstate Commerce Commission and before the courts, if necessary, and they have every right that a shipper has now, and more.

Mr. RAMSPECK. But if they had representation on the committee they could avoid the necessity, in many, many instances, of going to the burdensome program of an appeal after an adverse decision has been made.

I hope the Committee will accept this amendment.

Mr. RAYBURN. Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman from Georgia and to the Committee that if the House adopts this amendment it is going farther afield than the Congress has ever gone in regulating any public utility.

This section of the bill provides a way for the management of the railroads to set up their committees.

It would be a remarkable thing if we should wish on the management of the railroads somebody that has no interest in the property of the railroads and who in our opinion has no right to sit as representing the owners, as the gentleman from North Carolina has so well said. The interest of the shipper is well protected in this bill, and the shipper has his remedy. I trust that the Committee will not adopt the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Georgia.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word in order to ask the chairman of the committee a question. Line 14, page 33, provides:

Members of the committees may be removed from office, and vacancies may be filled in like manner.

How are you going to remove them from office?

Mr. RAYBURN. They are to be removed in a like manner—those who elected them can remove them.

Mr. EDMONDS. The coordinator cannot remove them?

Mr. RAYBURN. No.

Mr. DEEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in connection with the bill, and include therein the names of several leading railroad companies, showing the salaries paid the presidents, and in addition to that some information furnished by the Reconstruction Finance Corporation which shows the names of 65 of the leading railroad companies which have secured loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation and the amount actually loaned, the amount paid back, and also the amount canceled.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Georgia?

There was no objection.

Mr. DEEN. Mr. Chairman, in connection with the passage of this bill S. 1580, entitled "An act to relieve the existing national emergency in relation to interstate railroad transportation", it is of interest to note the schedule of salaries paid the presidents of some of the leading railroad companies in the United States.

With the passage of this bill it is hoped that the coordinator will be instrumental in securing a lower schedule of salaries for high officials of railroads and a greater consideration for the thousands of laboring men connected with the railroads who make their existence possible. It is true that railroads have been handicapped by the appearance of trucks and busses and there ought to be specific regulations governing all common carriers, whether railroads or motor busses and trucks.

The greatest barrier to the progress of railroads is not the lack of business, nor the motor-transportation competition. It is freight rates. The structure of freight rates has been steadily climbing for the past 15 or 20 years. They are almost prohibitive at the present time. Industry and commerce have been at the mercy of the outrageous freight rates of railroad companies. A man in my district recently shipped a carload of goats from southern Georgia to New York. The freight was several dollars more than the price paid the shipper for his goats, whereupon the purchaser wired the shipper to wire or send him a certain amount of cash to pay the balance due on freight. The shipper wired that he could not send the cash but could ship him some more goats. This is a ridiculous situation, but it is representative of the unreasonable freight rates now in vogue. If this bill will correct this injustice and enable the producers and manufacturers to patronize the railroads, business throughout the country will take on new life and prosperity will be back again. A flexible schedule ought to be established so that railroad companies will not receive 2 and 3 times as much for hauling farm produce as the growers and shippers receive for the same produce. This will be real farm relief.
